TRENDS OF THE TIMES IN LEGISLATIVE REFORMS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Dayton Daily News entitled "Trends of the Times", relating to certain legislative reforms.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Dayton (Ohio) Daily News]

TRENDS OF THE TIMES

Through the ether the well-known voice of Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska—the radio makes the voices of our leaders as familiar as their faces—telling what, in the light of his 30 years' experience as a legislator, a model State legislature would be like.

All of our States, copying from the forefathers, have tricameral legislatures. They think they have bicameral legislatures, but that is a mistake. Instead of two houses, Senator NORRIS points out, there are three.

There is the house of representatives, always the largest branch of the legislature. Then there is the more exclusive senate. Where does the third branch come in?

It comes in when house and senate have done their work. One of the two houses passes a bill. It goes to the other, where almost invariably amendments of various sorts are attached. The house has passed one bill; the senate another. The law must agree with itself. What is to be done?

The answer brings into being the third and, commonly, most important branch of all, the conference committee.

Each house appoints conferees. The conferees of the two houses make up the conference committee. This committee, usually in secret session, puts the two bills together, fixes up a bill of its own. The conference bill then goes back to house and senate. They must take it as it comes or throw it out as it comes. Usually they feel obliged to take it. The law as passed is then not the law as framed by the house and senate, but the law as framed by that powerful third branch of the legislature, the conference committee.

It is in conference frequently that the jokers attach themselves to the law.

There is also a fourth branch of the legislature, an unofficial branch. It is called the lobby. * * * Out of these 4-branch legislatures, the vast confusion which we know as lawmaking.

The Senator who wrote the twentieth amendment to the National Constitution, which the country now unanimously approves, would change this complicated legislative scene. It is in this jungle of a 3- or 4-branch law-making body that the political reptiles hide, he thinks. He would clear it up.

He would reduce the legislature of many branches to a legislature of one branch. Then he would make that branch small—small enough to be highly visible, highly responsible. He would pay them enough to permit them to give their time to their job.

In his own State of Nebraska he would have a 1-house legislature of about 20 members. He would elect them for 4 years. He would elect them without a party name or sign. What a State legislator believes about national affairs has nothing to do, Senator NORRIS says, with his fitness to direct a State. He would have his legislators elected on their own merits, not on the merits of their political ancestors.

These 20 legislators would be few enough to function effectively as a deliberative body. They would have time to familiarize themselves with affairs of the State. They would become too well informed to be easily fooled by the lobby folk whose trade is fooling legislators.

A hundred legislators are fooled into doing the wrong thing, the veteran Senator says, to one who is bought into doing the wrong thing. Most legislators are honest, but not all of them are smart; and the larger the legislative body, the less able the members are to know what is going on, the more certain they are to be fooled.

Our great-great-grandfathers, who threaded forest paths on horseback with a clean shirt and a plug of chewing tobacco in their saddle bags, found the 2-branch legislature of their great-great-grandparents good enough for them. We ride in airplanes, but the 2-branch legislature is with us yet.

When representative government took its beginning, the peoples were divided rigidly into castes. In the English-speaking world the people were divided, for political purposes, into humble commons and exalted lords. The lords could not think of sitting with the commoners. Besides, they had special privileges of their own to preserve.

So they had a legislative branch of their own, the House of Lords. And the commons had a house of their own, the House of Commons; and the two branches were independent of each other and, to keep the people from ruling too completely, the lords could veto the commons as the Senate can veto the House.

The time came to set up governments in free America. Here there were no castes, no lords and commoners; there were only people. And even as, to this day, the drinker of water from a jug pours out a little as a libation to the gods in which his ancestors believed, but of which he does not even know the name, so our fathers, though there were no lords and commoners to think about, framed their legislatures as if there were.

They quit sawing their lumber by hand. They turned from oxen to tractors. They gave up the stagecoach and adopted the railroad train. They tore away, with great pain, from the astronomy of Ptolemy and clove to that of Copernicus. They rejected Darwin and then accepted him. They permitted yellow fever to be changed from an act of God to a unnecessary visitation of a mosquito. But to their 2- 3- or 4-branch legislature they have clung. And when Senator NORRIS says to use our heads and get a legislature to match our other modern things, we say: "There goes that wild western radical again."

HOW TO RESTORE PROSPERITY

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article written by a farmer's wife in North Dakota entitled "How I Would Restore Prosperity to All."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW I WOULD RESTORE PROSPERITY TO ALL

Today all the earth is smiling in God's glorious sunshine and like unto the busy little ant, whose little ant hill, the only home nest which it has on earth, is turned over and disrupted by a thoughtless child—just so arises a sorrowful picture of disrupted and broken farm homes and frantic people running hither and yon, without knowing where they are to lay their weary souls and tired bodies. Next:

No recourse is left unto them but to perish, and thousands have already done that very thing. Thousands, perhaps millions, are staggering along, trying to hold on and save a portion of their beloved homes and farms, only to drop by the wayside from weakness and exhaustion.

No protection, no help or relief is found or offered to the tired, weary souls who have toiled and tilled the soil for countless generations and now stand, perhaps at the evening of their lives, forsaken and alone, perishing, perishing, for the want of a "cup" of loving kindness and understanding from the hands of their neighbor, Big Business.

This is the sad and depressing picture that is flashing on the screen of life for me today—broken-hearted farmers and their loved ones—my friends and neighbors. Broken homes and bleeding hearts are raising hands of supplication to the world, asking and pleading for mercy toward their loved ones. Pleading for true and individual personal help and relief, salvation and protection.

In this bitter and terrifying battle of the Armageddon which is being fought in the East (each individual human heart), my loved ones, my husband, myself, and our "homesteaded farm" stand out in the very center of the melee; on the battle front.

Peace must come quickly if any love of farm life is to be saved for the future and this woeful depression end. How can the world expect its young generation to follow in an industry that has become as weak and ill-paid as tilling the soil?

America's young generation has eyes and ears, its head, and entire body turned in the direction of big business.

Life is young, joyous, and free; as yet undeveloped enough mentally to see the vision of the development of big business, from the humble tiller of the soil, whom God created in the beginning of the world.

God created money as a medium of exchange. Therefore money is good. The evil name which clings to money sometimes comes from the way this human family of God handles and dispenses His gracious medium of exchange.

Surely the farmer, tiller of the soil and true agriculturist, is entitled to a living wage paid to him in real money for the work he does for the rest of the human family. Also some joy, recreation, and comforts in life, for his life of faithful service to all mankind. Money, justly earned, faithfully worked for, and joyously shared and circulated within the great order of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man here on earth, there is not another business in the world which would continue to operate below production costs and serve the human race with foodstuffs for years as the United States of America farmers have done for the past 11 years.

Great financial showers of relief are falling upon big business, wise and otherwise, but the drought-stricken farms and farmers—what about them?

Their suffering grows more intense and their burden heavier each day. Crops continue to grow and be grown at a loss to the producer, prices remain very low, but the crop of high interest rates on mortgages, delinquent taxes, private loans, and interest, doctor bills, and the children's school supplies continue to grow and flourish at a great rate. Farmers want to pay their bills, taxes, interest on loans, and all indebtedness; to help the rest of the world overcome the depression; but they are "broke", in debt, and helpless.

On the altar of the mind, Christ ministers to all mankind. Far be it from me to censure or criticize my brothers and sisters in spirit, and fellow sufferers in the present world-wide depression. All the world is trying to find a remedy and heal our present trouble and we are all doing the best we know how; so who can say or know whether my simple word picture may not have within it the seed for a real depression cure needed today?

Without the farmer, healthy, happy, and prosperous, the Government cannot function. Next to God stands our Government and we are all loyal to our God and our Government. So I say if I were the Government I would make an amortization loan to each individual farmer—not through a corporation—direct of the entire amount of each debtor's indebtedness plus all interest and a sufficiently large extra sum of ready money to carry on for a whole year, upon a low rate of interest, let us say 2 percent and 1 percent on principal. Amortization for 20 or 25 years or more if necessary to keep a perfect balance.

The borrower would have to be a genuine farmer, tilling the soil for a living, one in danger of losing his home, farm, or other personal property, or one who has already been foreclosed upon and still has a redemption period to lean upon.

I would ascertain the amount of each need from the farmer himself, verify it, at the tax office, mortgage, and bank loan registry, if necessary. Then I would issue a Government check for the entire amount of indebtedness recorded by the depressed debtor, plus a large enough sum of money to see him through to the finish of another growing season.

I would also designate the bank, preferably a local one, where Government check was to be deposited and annual installments paid in the future. I would register my faith in the farmer and borrower by allowing him to keep all redeemed papers in his own hands or in safe deposit at the bank where installments are being made.

Perhaps I, as the Government, would be called upon to have my faith shaken, knocked about, and badly bent in some instances, but not many. The farmers are too true, honest, and upright a people to stoop to cheating their Government; that would indeed be poor policy. It just is not done that way among true tillers of the soil.

This cup of loving kindness and true relief and help handed to friend farmer by his friend the Government would indeed take the crucified spirit of agriculture from the cross and allow its soul to rise again from the dead, much to the joy and glory of the entire world.

Here is a picture of the transfiguration, which would begin to take place immediately:

First, you will see a look of joy in the face of the farmer and his family. "Joy, oh joy", says he, "Thank God, I can now pay all my bills and hold my head up again."

Second, "Joy, oh joy", sing the many creditors. "Money, real money from Mr. Farmer at last. I was beginning to think I would never get it."

Third, fourth, and fifth step, "Joy, oh, joy," rings in the hearts of business, manufacture, and the home of the workingman; jobs are again open.

Sixth, closed banks begin to see hope, and joyfully prepare to help a good cause along. They did not go into business to withhold the depositors' money. Neither are they dishonest.

And seventh, our Government, which made all this joy possible by a bona fide Christian service and loan helps to swell the song of joy as it rings in the hearts of its people. And as praise and loving kindness again wells up in our sore hearts, "old man depression" will slip away and die from lack of attention.

Yours very truly,

I. C. M., a Farmer's Wife.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I am going to send to the desk a letter dated the 11th of April. For obvious reasons, I have erased the name of the town from which this letter comes and I have also deleted the name of the writer. I have done that for his protection. This letter is in line with numerous other letters I have received and illustrates the reason why Senators are receiving letters from persons who work in factories purporting to be against the 30-hour week bill. This letter is but one of many letters I have received explaining why Senators are getting letters signed by workers. I could put in a great many more letters of similar import, but I am going only to ask that this letter be read at this time, and I invite the attention of Senators who have received letters from workers throughout the country to this letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and the letter presented by him will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

APRIL 11, 1933.

Mr. HUGO L. BLACK.

DEAR SENATOR: In regards to your 30-hour-week workday.

I understand that all or some of the mill officials are asking the employees to sign for a 10-hour workday, telling them that their wages would be cut to half if they work only 6 hours a day. I am a textile worker. The plant in which I work I work 13 hours per night 5 nights per week when we are on full time. I run four spinning frames for $12.50 per week. Now they have speeded the machines so I can't run but three. That cuts my wages one fourth and get the same production on 3 frames that I got on 4 at one fourth less wages.

It seems to me that the mill officials are taking the advantage of the working people because they have to work and ask them to sign such paper.

Yours truly,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H.J.Res. 152) to provide for the payment of pages for the Senate and House of Representatives for the first session of the Seventy-third Congress, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon was almost entirely occupied in a discussion of the pending committee amendment, being part 3 of the unfinished business, which is a new prescription in the matter of farm legislation with regard to the fixing of prices. I think I can probably recall all the measures which have heretofore been advanced designed to raise the price level of agricultural commodities. I shall start with the old McNary-Haugen bill, which sought to provide what is known as the "equilization fee." Under that bill the measure of the price the farmer should receive for his products was the current price plus the tariff. In other words, the slogan was, "We are attempting to make the tariff effective as to all crops of which we have an exportable surplus." Of course, in its nature the bill was price fixing. About that I have no criticism at this time. Twice that measure was vetoed by the President.

Later on the Senate and the House passed and the President vetoed a bill embodying what is known as the "debenture plan." That also attempted to make the tariff effective by fixing the price to the farmer at the average current price plus the tariff, except that as to such commodities as cotton, on which there was no tariff, a specific sum was arbitrarily specified by the Congress as the measure of compensation.

In the allotment bill, which passed the House of Representatives the first of the present year, a fixed price was ascertained by what is called the "fair exchange value plus the current average price." That plan, Mr. President, is carried into the pending bill for the purpose of determining the tax to be assessed against the processor and the sum to be paid the farmer for his products embraced in the basic commodities mentioned in the bill.

Part 3 is a new venture in the matter of the fixing of values for agricultural products. It was brought into this bill by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry because it was stoutly insisted that it should be made a part of the bill by Mr. John A. Simpson, the very able and capable manager of the Farmers Union. That organization, Mr. President, for a number of years has pleaded with the Congress whenever it undertook to legislate on the question of farm relief to base such relief on what may be called the "cost of production."

I appreciate the very many difficulties necessarily encountered in arriving at a determination of the cost of production. They are also difficulties, as pointed out by the able Senator from Montana yesterday with respect to the application of other formulas in this bill; but they are not insuperable; nor do I claim that the difficulties in regard to part 3 are insurmountable.

What is the formula provided under that part of the bill was the question discussed yesterday, and to it I wish now very briefly to refer. The Department of Agriculture has never fixed any particular measure of compensation which should be paid to the growers measured by the cost of production. It has made estimates of the cost of production through the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, but no final and certain determination has been made by the Department. It is impossible to reach that point where we can say, as a rule, "this is the cost of production," on account of the many human elements involved, the varying conditions of soil and weather in the different sections of the country, and also the diverse methods of culture as applied to husbandry on the farm; but the Department of Agriculture has made an estimate which is fairly accurate in regard to the cost of production, including in its estimate the elements of interest on the investment of the farmer, operating costs, taxes, and other interest.

Those four are the major elements taken into consideration, but even a determination of those four elements leaves an uncertain base, because the human factor itself should probably be classified as the first one of the group of four. Consequently when we approach the subject it is extremely difficult, with the limited experience the Department has had, absolutely to fix the cost of production. I think that is obvious from the standpoint of anybody who will consider the question.

However, Mr. President, this great farm organization, the Farmers Union, has insisted, inasmuch as we have provided about $2,000,000 a year in order to study this particular problem, that we invoke the studies made by the Department and encourage it to go forward in order that it may ultimately reach what might be called a "basis of accuracy" with respect to the cost of production. The committee, I think, had that in mind, and, as an alternative plan, even though it would be difficult of operation, considered that it should be incorporated in the bill in order that the Secretary of Agriculture might employ it if he so desired.

Now, as to the question of fair exchange value, there has been some doubt expressed and there have also been some inaccuracies of statement. This bill, Mr. President, fixes a maximum price which farmers will receive for their products. That value is fixed upon the present current average price of the product plus the difference between that current average price and the pre-war exchange value during the base period from 1909 to 1914. It is true that as the current average price fluctuates from day to day so there is a fluctuation in the amount of the tax imposed upon the processors; of that there can be no doubt whatsoever.

Each day it will be essential and necessary for the Secretary of Agriculture to promulgate information setting forth the current exchange value of the various products on that day; and as the daily value of products sold in the open market varies, or as it increases, so will there be a decrease or a diminution in the tax paid by the processors; but that in no wise affects the price level, which is stationary and which is based upon the fair exchange value during the pre-war period of 1909 to 1914, plus the average current price. That introduces a feature about which I spoke the other day regarding the arbitrary power given to the Secretary from time to time to change the processing tax.

Mr. President, I appreciate the uncertainty in arriving at the cost of production; however, I shall go along with the committee, as I usually do, and support the optional formula specified herein. If it is indefinite, probably the Secretary of Agriculture will not employ it. It may be a prescription that finally, in use, may become something more certain than the estimates are today. In order, however—and that is really what I rose for—to get the expression of Mr. Simpson, who is the head of the Farmers Union, as to what he thought the specifications should be in respect to arriving at what he thought was the cost of production, I ask unanimous consent that the clerk read from the desk the part that I have marked on pages 123 and 124 of the testimony given before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry by Mr. John A. Simpson, president of the Farmers Union, at a hearing on March 27, 1933.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Senator McGILL. Under your theory, Mr. Simpson, would you fix the price at the exact cost of production? Is that your idea?

Mr. SIMPSON. Including interest on investment. I might say, if we had our national secretary here, who is our expert in a plan for developing costs of farm crops, it would be most interesting to hear him. He is an expert on it. We have had him in places where there would be a hundred economists, and he would present his plan and they were unable to find any holes in it.

I can just in a word tell you how we set up costs. It is very different from the way the Agriculture Department does it. Take, for instance, a wheat farmer. We find out what is the average-sized wheat farmer. We find, say, that the average wheat farmer produces 200 acres; then we find out what the average production for a wheat farmer is that has 200 acres. Say it is 3,000 bushels. We then find out what average side lines of income a wheat farmer that produces 200 acres has. He sells so many eggs; he sells so much cream; he may have a few hogs. Then that is the income of the side lines. Then we build up his budget and we build up a budget on what he is entitled to as an American citizen. He has the average of 5 children. He has 1 in the grade schools, 1 in the high school, and 1 in the university, and we put in the budget the cost of sending 3 children to those different schools. We put that in the budget. His children are entitled to dental care. You know the average white farmer—I am not talking about negroes—the average white farmer, more than half of them do not give their children dental care, so we put what an average family of 5 children should have in the way of dental care per year, and put that in the budget. We provide that his wife can have hospital care. You know the average farm woman never was inside of a hospital in her life. Many times she has borne a dozen children and never had a doctor at confinement times. She is entitled to hospital care, and we put what the average expense is in there. They are entitled to some recreation, and we put in that expense. When we have built up the budget, of course, there is the expense of producing, but we have the expense of the family living in, too.

We deduct what is received for his eggs and his cream, and so forth, from the budget. Then his 3,000 bushels of wheat must bring a price that will equal that budget. That is the way we arrive at it, and in arriving at our basis of figuring we come out a little higher in what the estimated cost of an average bushel of wheat and the average pound of cotton is than the Department over here does. If we would ever get a law that allows us cost of production, we would be there when they are making up the figures, showing them where we are entitled to more. As long as the figures are just matters of record, of course, we do not go over and go to the expense of showing them that they are not including all the things they should.

Senator NORRIS. Can you give us the deductions, the conclusions, that you have reached in the average cost of wheat for different years on the plan you have outlined?

Mr. SIMPSON. In recent years our average cost of wheat will run up around $1.50 a bushel; and corn will run——

Senator McGILL (interposing). Is that based on the Chicago market?

Mr. SIMPSON. On the Chicago market. Corn will run about 90 cents. Cotton will run about 20 cents. The Department's figures over here for the last few years will show cotton about 17 and wheat, if you take in the last 5 or 6 years, wheat $1.25, and so on. We are higher than they are because we are demanding a standard of living for farmers that is equal to what other people have, and we are entitled to that, we feel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, a printed copy of the amendment is on each Senator's desk. I should like, however, on line 4 of the proposed amendment, after the figures "$1,000", to add the words "for each violation."

I send to the desk a perfected copy of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator modifies his amendment, as stated. The question is on the modified amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if we leave this remedy for enforcement as provided in the bill, I think it will certainly be a very severe and extraordinary procedure, and an extraordinary provision of law.

It is sought by the penalty as provided in the bill to punish every person who may purchase a commodity upon which a price has been fixed for a less price than that fixed upon the commodity.

A price of $1, we will say, has been fixed upon a particular article. Some person who may not be informed as to the price which has been fixed upon that particular commodity purchases it at a less price. Then, under the bill in its original form, he is subjected to a penalty of $1,000 and of 1 year's imprisonment, or both.

I very much commend the effort of the Senator from Kansas to modify and to lesson any such harsh penalty. Everybody in the country cannot know what the prices are that have been fixed upon every commodity that comes within the provisions of this bill; but if a perfectly innocent person goes in and makes a purchase at a sum less than the price fixed, unless we change the bill the man may be hauled up before the court and subjected to a penalty of 1 year's imprisonment or $1,000 fine for having purchased something at a less price than that fixed under the provisions of this law.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. TYDINGS. The other day, when we had before us the bill providing for a modification of the Volstead Act, many Senators were apprehensive lest we should violate the Constitution. I hope the Senator from Florida—who was not one of those, I may say—in the course of his remarks will point out where we have the constitutional authority to regulate a transaction by which a farmer in Harford County, Md., sells to a merchant in Harford County, Md., some farm commodity in violation of this law.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Personally, I do not think we have the constitutional authority; but I am arguing the matter more from the standpoint of common, ordinary, everyday justice.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I have not been able to understand—perhaps I have been a little dense about it—is how Senators could strain over this terrific gnat of amending the Volstead Act so that 3-percent beer could be sold who now have no hesitancy at all about violating the Constitution through the exercise of what I conceive to be a power which the Constitution does not even inferentially contain.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I fully agree with the statement of the Senator. His statement, in ordinary terms, is nothing more than that there is a total absence of consistency on the part of Congress in dealing with different kinds of legislation; and I think probably we are all more or less subject to that indictment. There is an absence of consistency in one day having to support a certain bill because it is called an administration measure and the next day having to oppose another bill because it is not an administration measure, and excuses and alibis of that character.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate the motive of those who are supporting this bill. I appreciate the necessity which actuates them to do it; but I hope that somebody, in the course of the debate, will point out what constitutional authority we have for making a crime of a transaction between two persons in the same county in the same State where a hog is the object which is bought and sold.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I doubt very much the constitutionality of it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I hope some Senator will do that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I was just pleading a little more for the innocent person, the person who may offend without any knowledge that he is doing so, and, in consequence, may be brought into a criminal court and tried under the penalties provided in the bill. I like the plan proposed by the Senator from Kansas better.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more observation?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will.

Mr. TYDINGS. The other day, in a very learned speech by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], during the consideration of the 30-hour week, he pointed out that unless an article was actually deleterious or injurious to people as a whole we could not bar it from interstate commerce. Now, the transaction which I have instanced—namely, a transaction between two people in the same county of the same State in which a good, healthy hog changes hands for a certain sum—has nothing to do with interstate commerce; and I hope somebody will show us the constitutional authority for the passage of any such provision as is contained in this act. If we could debate here for 3 or 4 days whether or not the 30-hour week was constitutional on the grounds I have stated, I do not see how the present situation is even worthy of debate; and, as far as I am concerned, I shall vote with a great deal of pleasure against this bill in its present form.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I had not expected to make any extended remarks. Does the Senator wish to ask me a question?

Mr. McGILL. I simply wish to inquire if the Senator from Florida does not feel, as well as the Senator from Maryland, that constitutional questions are not involved as much in part 2 of this bill as they are in part 3?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I was not raising a constitutional question at all, Mr. President. I rose merely to give my support to the amendment which had been proposed by the Senator from Kansas. Under his amendment, this suit has to be instituted through the Secretary of Agriculture; and it gives the poor and probably ignorant offender some right of hearing and consideration in a civil tribunal before he is hauled before the criminal courts. I am in favor of that considerate and more reasonable and just method of dealing with persons who may offend under this statute.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, inasmuch as I am forced to be absent tomorrow, I should like for about 5 minutes to make known my position on this legislation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Surely it is not the intention to keep the Senate in session tomorrow, on Good Friday.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not certain but that I may be away Saturday as well and will not be able to return until Monday, and I did not want to have my pair announced without a brief sort of explanation.

Mr. President, I recognize as much as anyone does that the present emergency calls for unusual and drastic and at times apparently unreasonable treatment. I have the greatest sympathy with those who are seeking to bridge the economic chasm over which the Nation must pass if it wants to reach any comparative prosperity again.

Mr. President, I do think there should be some limitation upon our activities. I cannot, even in the face of the circumstances, support a measure under which where John Smith sells to John Brown a perfectly healthy hog at a price mutually agreeable to them both, because he has violated some regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture, he is a criminal, liable to a fine of a thousand dollars and a year in the penitentiary. If there is any provision, directly or inferentially, in the Constitution, which permits that action by Congress, I am at a loss to know where that authority is. The case I cite is not interstate commerce, it is purely domestic commerce. True, the article may eventually move in interstate commerce, but it may originate and may be consumed within a compass of a hundred yards space.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I think that if the Senator would read the bill carefully he would not make a statement of that kind, because there is nothing of the kind in the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Secretary of Agriculture issues an order that a pig shall not be sold at less than so much a pound, and one farmer in my county sells a pig to another farmer, will not that violate the regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield again, the bill takes care of cases of that kind. There is no penalty attached at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. Cases of what kind?

Mr. FRAZIER. Of the kind the Senator suggests, a sale from one farmer to another.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator mean that in that case the penalty would not attach?

Mr. FRAZIER. There would be no penalty, no violation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I would like to have the language of this amendment pointed out which exempts anybody, because it says any person who buys any part of any commodity that is supposed to go into domestic consumption is subject to the penalty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I will yield in a moment. I may be wrong, and I hope I am. I confess that I have not read this provision very carefully, but I have read it, and my interpretation of it fits the case I have pictured. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, under the bill as originally drawn and reported I think in a technical sense the Senator would be right; but I want to point out, as I have tried to do before, both to the Senator from Maryland and to the Senator from Kentucky, who is very much worried about the man who wants to sell a plug of tobacco to his neighbor, that we have agreed to an amendment, and it is now in the bill, which provides that the Secretary of Agriculture can make such exceptions in all these sales by regulation if he wants to. I am trying to look at the matter in a practical sense. I would not have any objection, if an amendment could be framed that would apply to all these individual cases, to putting it into the measure, as we have tried to do in the main part of the bill, but I cannot conceive that when the Secretary issues his regulations he is going to permit such a case as that to which the Senator has called our attention to exist. It seems to me we ought to give him credit for having ordinary sense and excluding in his regulations all such cases. In addition to that, as far as I know, there is not a Senator here objecting to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. If we are ever allowed to vote on it, the penalty provided will all go out of the bill, so that going to the penitentiary and paying a thousand dollar fine will be obliterated entirely.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I confess that I myself would be very much shocked indeed if the Secretary of Agriculture, insofar as he were able, in the application of the terms of this provision, did not make the exceptions in the regulations he would promulgate. But may I point out in that connection that I am not quite willing to turn a power of that kind over to the Secretary of Agriculture, even though he would attempt to take care of the cases.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to take up the Senator's time, but in the committee an amendment which would apply to the other provisions of the bill, but would not apply to this one, was offered. I think the Senator is technically right in his statement, because this amendment was added to the bill after the other amendment was put in. Practically every member of the committee worked nearly one whole day trying to frame an amendment and put it into the measure that would exclude cases such as the one the Senator mentions. Nobody wants such a thing done, but, in trying to frame an amendment, we would get one worked out, and then somebody would cite another case to which it would not apply, and we would try to cover that. I doubt very much whether we would accomplish anything with our amendment. When I offered the amendment, which is now in the bill, thinking of the difficulties the committee had had in trying to frame an amendment, I provided for the giving of authority to the Secretary to eliminate anything he wanted to. It seems to me that, acting in the best of faith, the committee were up against a practical impossibility in attempting to frame a law that would apply to all these cases. For instance, we could cite another case where a man would make sausage out of a hog. Then the question was asked, Suppose he did not happen to have a grinding machine and took the meat across the road to a neighbor and that neighbor would grind it for him? We have not covered that instance. The Secretary could cover all such cases that might arise. I concede they might arise; and therefore we have tried to give to the Secretary the authority to eliminate them, because we found that, even doing our best, we could not cover every case. Perhaps the Senator could do better, perhaps the Senate itself could do better; and if so, God speed them. We found it a practical impossibility to frame a statute that would cover all the possible contingencies that might arise.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am very sorry that the criticism which I have to make of the bill has to be destructive criticism. I would much rather it could be constructive criticism, and I realize that it is easier to be critical than it is to be correct, and I do not want to have it appear that in my judgment the committee has not dealt as best it could with a very difficult problem.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator would concede that this provision would be all right if the Secretary of Agriculture always acted with wisdom and benevolence, would he not? And does not the Senator in these days of emergencies believe in a wise and benevolent dictator?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I first of all would have to say that I do not know where we would get the constitutional authority even to deal with the subject.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that the constitutionality of this bill is any more doubtful than the constitutionality of the economy or bank bill or even the beer bill?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I do.

I do, because in this case the Senator from Idaho very ably said the other day that Congress excluded articles in interstate commerce because they were either deleterious or, in some other fashion, were injurious to society as a whole. That does not apply here.

The question I am presenting is, suppose there is a perfectly healthy hog which the Senator from Idaho owns, and which I desire to buy, and we both live in the same county in the same State. The Senator from Nebraska has just said that he believes that in cases of that kind there would be exceptions, and I agree with his observation that, as far as it could be done, the Secretary would attempt to make exceptions. But under what constitutional authority has the Congress the right—and if Congress has not the right, how can the Secretary have the right—to prohibit me from selling a perfectly healthy hog to my neighbor 50 yards across the road?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think there is any such constitutional authority, any more than I thought there was any constitutional authority for prohibiting the shipment of perfectly healthy nonintoxicating beer from one State into another.

Mr. TYDINGS. I mentioned that exact question before the Senator came in, and I observed in that connection that I did not see how men could strain at the gnat of modifying the Volstead Act to raise the alcoholic content a very small bit, saying it was unconstitutional, but who were ready to swallow a camel of unconstitutional authority and vote for a measure of this kind, with no power in the Constitution whatever.

Mr. BORAH. It depends entirely, I presume, on taste.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, assuming that the Volstead Act did violate the Constitution, as amended, the violation was small, but it was a violation, nevertheless, if my position was wrong, but I do not think it was; but in this case the violation is not small; it is complete, because no man in the whole Chamber can show any authority whatsoever for preventing me from selling a perfectly healthy hog to a man in my own county.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with that entirely. I do not dispute the constitutional question at all. I only regret that we did not start earlier upon this question of legislating according to the Constitution.

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, the Senator did start upon it 2 or 3 days ago, and I am wondering now whether he is going to be consistent and vote against the pending bill because it, as conceived by him, is likewise without constitutional authority.

Mr. BORAH. I stated, Mr. President, that the only part of the bill which I approved, which I believed would be effective and within the Constitution, was the portion with reference to refinancing farm mortgages.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then is the Senator going to vote for the whole thing, a part of which is unconstitutional, because a part of it is pleasing to him?

Mr. BORAH. If it is not separated, I shall vote for the entire bill, but if I had my way of transacting the business I would vote for the latter proposition only and vote against the other. But I frankly say that I am voting for a portion of the bill which I think objectionable, because I feel the great and vital importance of the other portion.

Mr. TYDINGS. I would, too. I would much prefer that it were separated. But I go back to my original observation, that sometimes the constitutionality of a provision takes on great weight, and there are other times when the constitutionality of another provision which is even a more flagrant violation takes on less weight.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the Senator whether, if we assume that Congress does have the power to pass such a law it may delegate that authority to an official who may adopt regulations a violation of which would make a man guilty of a criminal offense?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, to my way of thinking, there is absolutely only one answer. There is one power Congress has which it can never delegate to any person, Government official or otherwise, and that is the power to fix by regulation crimes and the punishment of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have not spoken on the bill. Have I any time on that? I want to speak only 5 minutes more. I should like to have this opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unfortunately, the Senator would have no time on the bill.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to insert in the RECORD a letter written by one of my constituents, who seems to be in opposition to the bill.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Sun, Apr. 7, 1933]

AN UNWORKABLE PLAN—WHAT A BUSINESS MAN THINKS OF FARM BOUNTIES

To the EDITOR OF THE SUN.

SIR: When the provisions of the farm bill were first suggested to Secretary Wallace he wanted the farm organizations to get together on some one plan; the plan finally suggested was that they give absolute power to the President or his representative to limit production and adjust prices. Various farm organizations appeared in favor of the bill. The middleman, the long-headed business man, the long-headed merchant, and the manufacturer, who are also patriotic, and would also like to see better prices for farm products, were permitted to appear, but in the hysterical condition of the public mind any criticism was discounted in advance and the universal opposition of all thinking business men was given practically no consideration.

It seems to me that a bill of this importance should be considered on its own merits without tagging onto it the $2,000,000,000 mortgage bill, either as a bait or log-rolling idea to get additional votes for the bill. I believe that bills already passed and moves already taken are sufficiently constructive to have immediate effect upon farm prices were it not that the business man is now told that the Government is going to take dictatorial power on farm products and change the laws of supply and demand. I believe that if tomorrow it were announced from Washington that the Government would keep its hands off business you would see an immediate revival of confidence and prices.

The $2,000,000,000 mortgage plan may be wise, but what I am referring to mainly is the farm bill, which limits production and thereby hopes to increase prices. In my opinion, and the opinion of many other people who handle raw commodities, the limiting of production by the farmers who raised certain crops last year will have the exact reverse effect of that intended if the bill goes through in time so that farmers may be signed up to limit their crops. In other words, only the farmers who raised crops last year would be signed up. Those who raised their normal crops last year might be willing to sign a pledge to reduce their acreage, that is, to raise small crops this year. Those who raised small crops last year would not be willing to sign because there would be a greater advantage in their raising a full crop, and those who didn't raise at all last year could not be limited except by night riders and would not be compelled to sign.

To put it concretely, suppose 3 farmers 2 years ago raised 10 acres each of tobacco. Last year farmer no. 1 raised 10 acres, farmer no. 2 raised 3 acres, and farmer no. 3, being far-sighted and foreseeing low prices, raised no tobacco. As soon as it is known that the farmers are signing up, farmer no. 1 will agree with the Government to raise only 7 acres and will receive remuneration in accordance. Farmer no. 2 will say, "Why should I limit my production, because I would only get compensation for half an acre, while if I raise a full crop of 10 acres I will be able to take advantage of the higher prices?" Farmer no. 3, who raised nothing last year, will raise his full 10 acres. Other farmers who raised no tobacco before will also raise tobacco, so that instead of having smaller acreage the production will be increased.

I have been dealing directly with farmers for 30 years in a very large way. I know the farmer's psychology, and the farmer is only interested in raising large crops when he thinks he will get good prices; when he knows the Government is working for that end and that large producers are cutting down their acreage, he will naturally raise all he can.

Another great objection to this plan is that the ordinary, prudent business man who invests in farm products, including the middleman and the manufacturer, will certainly not go ahead in a normal way and invest in crops when he is absolutely at the mercy of a dictator, who may or may not continue a certain policy. So that instead of the farmer being able in a normal way to raise his product and turn it over to the middleman or manufacturer for cash, so that he can raise his next crop, he will be compelled to carry his crop himself, whether as an individual or as a cooperative, and the normal orderly development of business will be curtailed until the business man is assured that there will be no further interference with normal business.

NATHAN I. BIJUR.

NEW YORK, April 6.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, inasmuch as it is not my intention to vote for the committee amendment embraced in part 3, I shall take just a few minutes, and, within the limitation fixed by agreement, express some of the reasons for my failure to support the amendment.

I think it is already understood that the amendment was adopted by the committee, and is not a part of what may be termed the administration bill. Of course, everyone also understands that the administration, through the Secretary of Agriculture and others, has expressed opposition to the amendment for the reasons which have gone into the RECORD.

Clearly and without question the committee has the right to offer the amendment and the Senate has the privilege of adopting it if it believes the adoption of the amendment will improve the bill and aid in accomplishing the purposes of the legislation.

Some of the reasons I do not give support to the amendment include the fact that without doubt if a scientific method of arriving at cost of production is pursued the farmer will still produce at a loss insofar as his entire crop is concerned. The cost of production price applies only to the portion of the crop that is set aside for domestic consumption. As to the commodities which are embraced within the bill, the percentage which will be reserved for domestic consumption varies. In the case of cotton, for instance, it is about 40 or 45 percent of the entire crop. I do not see anything to be accomplished by adopting the cost of production plan insofar as the benefits to the farmer are concerned, because it will still require him to produce at a loss when we take into consideration his entire crop.

Another reason is found in the statement made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. He referred to the fact that in different localities the cost of production varies greatly. I think that fact could be demonstrated to the satisfaction of everyone if one had the time and disposition to do so. True, the average cost of production is the basis incorporated in the amendment, but in some localities the cost of producing wheat is more than twice what it is in other localities. That is true of cotton and other staple products. The variation in the cost of production is affected by the difference in soil and by the difference in season. For illustration, in the State of Arkansas in 1923 the average production of cotton per acre was about 98 pounds. In 1921 the average production per acre was approximately 260 pounds, or almost three times the production of 1923. One can readily see that that affects the cost of production.

Then the cost varies also among different producers in the same locality. I do not believe it is necessary to make an elaborate argument to enforce that conclusion. We must make an average as to different producers in the same locality, an average as to different soils, and an average as to difference in communities or sections.

It has been said here that the West favors the cost-of-production plan. I remember that one Senator asserted yesterday that he did not believe it is a practicable plan, but nevertheless he is going to support it because the people in the section from which he comes have been led to believe that this is the best method of relieving the farmer.

Mr. President, do you know the reason that state of public opinion exists? It is the result of a confusion of thought as to what constitutes cost of production, as to what the prices of farm products will be when the Secretary of Agriculture finds the cost of production. That brings me to a brief discussion of the different plans of ascertaining the cost of production.

The Senator from Oregon read into the RECORD a statement by the head of one of the great farm organizations, Mr. Simpson, the statement appearing at page 123 of the hearings, in which he took the position that a proper finding as to the cost of production would include dental costs for the children of the farmer's family, hospital services for members of the family, and education for the members of the family. It is admitted that the Department of Agriculture has an entirely different basis for ascertaining cost of production.

If we pursue what may be termed the scientific method to ascertain the cost of production and limit it to the charges that may properly enter into the acquirement of the soil, the seed, the sowing, the cultivation, the harvesting, and the marketing, it will be found that the difference is more than 2 to 1.

If we adopt the so-called "Simpson plan" for estimating cost of production, we can make the cost of production anything we wish, but it will vary even more greatly than it would in the case of the adoption of the scientific method. I do not know that the term "scientific" is particularly applicable to the method that is employed by the Department of Agriculture. We realize that if the farmer has the misfortune to have illness in his family, hospital charges would accrue. If his family have occasion to secure dental services, those charges accrue. If he has no children, there is no cost of education. To come right down to bedrock, there is no reasonable basis for charging living expenses into the cost of production further than is recognized in the plan and method of the Department of Agriculture.

To illustrate a little further the point I am trying to make, the Secretary of Agriculture says the cost of production of wheat is 60 cents a bushel and the cost of production of cotton is 8 cents a pound. If we made that the price to be obtained by the farmers under the bill, we would not have accomplished any satisfactory result. If we adopt the plan which permits taking into account a higher standard of living than the farmers now enjoy, we would raise the price of wheat to $1.25 or $1.50 a bushel and the price of cotton to from 17 to 23 cents a pound, according to Mr. Simpson, I believe. There is no one who has had practical experience in the growing of cotton or wheat who would be satisfied with the declaration that it now costs 17 to 23 cents a pound to grow cotton or that it now costs $1.25 or $1.50 a bushel to grow wheat. The statement is out of all proportion to the actual facts.

The people in the West and in other parts of the country have been deceived into believing that the cost-of-production plan includes the incorporation in the expenses of production of higher standards of living, of anything that we might be willing or desirous of seeing the farmer and his family enjoy. But, of course, there is nothing in the amendment which authorizes or prescribes any new rule for the ascertainment of the cost of production. The method which will prevail if the amendment is adopted will be that which has been pursued by the Department of Agriculture heretofore.

We had just as well understand now and let the farmer understand that if we write this amendment into the bill we are not giving him the benefits that he has been led to believe will be derived from the amendment. We had just as well understand that the cost of production does not mean 23 cents a pound for cotton. It does not cost that much to produce cotton. Every Senator from a Southern State knows that it does not cost 23 cents a pound now to produce cotton nor anything like that amount, and it does not cost $1.25 or $1.50 to produce a bushel of wheat.

Something has been said about the unconstitutionality of the provision. I shall not go into that question at this time. We cannot send a man to prison, though I believe the penalty has been modified so that he may not be sent to prison under the terms of the bill, nor can he be fined.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas, while he is discussing cost of production, that the cost of production is wholly determined by the cost per acre. The cost of production on a farm which yields 100 pounds of cotton to the acre is 20 cents or more. If it yields 300 pounds to the acre it will drop to 9 cents. Under the theory provided in the bill we could not possibly ascertain the cost of production on any cotton farm or any group of cotton farms.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have already made that point, if the Senator from North Carolina will pardon me. I cited an illustration where a certain State for the 1 year mentioned had an average production of cotton of 90 pounds per acre and just a few years earlier had an average production of 260 pounds per acre. I also emphasized the differences due to soil, locality, season, and the intelligence and diligence of the producer himself.

Everyone here admits that the cost of production is not an approximately accurate standard. At least I understand that to be the case. The variation between sections, between localities in the same section, between soils in the same community, and producers on the same soil, is so great as to make the rule of cost of production quite indefinite and the difficulty of making an average from it almost insurmountable.

Mr. President, I do not believe any practical benefit is to be accomplished by the adoption of this plan, and I will tell the Senate frankly why. If it is adopted, there will be intense pressure brought on the Secretary of Agriculture to employ this plan instead of the other plan embraced in the bill known as the fair-exchange-value method. If it is not adopted he will be harassed in the operation of the law. If it is adopted it will demonstrate its futility to contribute to the raising of prices to anything like what is expected of it.

Mr. President, I shall take no further time in discussion of the matter.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 25, line 17, after the word "production", insert "including therein a reasonable profit."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the section provides for average cost of production. This would include a reasonable profit. The average cost of production is to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. A reasonable profit would also be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] just stated, the average cost of production would be below the cost in some places and above the cost in other places. In order to even it up a little more and give the farmers a little profit, I want the committee amendment to include the term "including therein a reasonable profit." The title of the bill is "to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power." Of course, if we can raise the prices a little higher for our basic commodities, the purchasing power of the farmer will be increased.

The declaration of policy in this bill, which is found at the beginning of section 2, on page 2, is as follows:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress—
> (1) To establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period.

Mr. President, in order to establish this purchasing power, it seems to me the farmer must have the average cost of production as provided in the bill and a reasonable profit. No other business can succeed in any other way than by getting cost of production and a reasonable profit. As the Senator from Arkansas pointed out, the amount that will be paid on the basis of the cost of production under this provision will be only on that portion of a commodity which is used for home consumption; in case of wheat, from 70 to 80 percent, and in the case of cotton, from 45 to 50 percent. Therefore, in order to reestablish the purchasing power of the farmer, he should have a reasonable profit in addition to the cost of production.

Under the pre-war parity price, in my opinion, the farmer would not get cost of production. It might have been cost of production before the war, but conditions have greatly changed since that time. For instance, prices of farm products are less than half what they were in the pre-war period; taxes are more than twice as high as they were in the pre-war period, agricultural indebtedness is 150 percent more now than what it was in the pre-war period, and the farmers pay more than twice as much interest as they did in the pre-war period. Furthermore, freight rates on agricultural commodities have increased 55 percent; in other words, while in the pre-war period of 1909–14 in North Dakota we paid 10 cents a bushel to ship our wheat from where it was grown to the market at Minneapolis, under existing higher freight rates it costs 15½ cents per bushel. Therefore the parity price would not be adequate under present conditions of higher taxes, higher freight rates, higher interest, or more interest at least than we paid at that time; and so, in my opinion, the parity price will not restore the farmers' purchasing power. Farm products sold in January of this year at 40 percent below the pre-war price, while the commodities bought by the farmer were 5 percent above the pre-war price. Therefore the purchasing power of the farmer is today less than half what it was in the pre-war period.

More than that, conditions have changed a great deal since the pre-war period. Some of the things that we consider necessities today were practically unheard of in that period. It is, I believe, generally conceded that the farmer is entitled to an automobile, a radio, a telephone, and conveniences of that kind on his farm. An automobile is a necessity today, and the radio is also a necessity in order that the farmer may be informed as to the market condition of the various things that affect his crops and his prices. In 1909–14, the pre-war period, automobiles were not used by the farmer to any extent and radios were unheard of.

Furthermore, in the period of 1909–14 we had a fairly good export market; we sold all the commodities which we produced at that time at fair prices. Wheat, for instance, sold at 94 cents a bushel, not only that portion of the crop sold for home consumption but all which was produced sold for that price. The same thing was true of cotton; the price planters obtained for the portion consumed at home at that time was also paid for the portion that was exported. Today we have practically no export market. Therefore the pre-war parity prices will today not restore the farmer's purchasing power to where it was during the period before the war, because of the change in conditions; and anyone who thinks that the pre-war parity prices, under existing conditions, are going to restore the purchasing power of the farmer is, in my opinion, absolutely wrong. I think that theory is all "bunk."

If we can include in this amendment a reasonable profit as well as an average cost of production to the farmer it will, in my opinion, help materially. It will give the farmer an opportunity to obtain the average cost of production and a reasonable profit for that portion of his commodity used for home consumption in the United States.

We have got to readjust our farming on a basis of home consumption in the case of most of our farm products, because so many of such products today have practically no export market at all. That applies to wheat; it applies to meat products, and to almost everything, with the possible exception of cotton, and, even in the case of cotton, the export price is so low that we shall undoubtedly have to cut down acreage and production of cotton if the planters are going to make a profit of growing that crop in this country.

I had a letter yesterday from a farmer living in North Dakota which struck me as rather significant. He stated that the Wall Street bankers and capitalists were bleeding Uncle Sam to death while the farmers were "going broke." He said that if the administration and the Congress think that they can balance the Budget when the farmers are getting less than 50 percent of the cost of production for their products they are "plumb crazy."

Mr. President, I think that farmer is correct. It is an absolute impossibility to balance the Federal Budget and to keep it balanced with the food-producing element in this country, the farmers of this Nation, selling their products below cost of production and going broke by the thousands, yes, by the millions, all over the country, for, after all is said and done, agriculture is the one basic industry of the Nation upon which we must depend to produce the food with which to feed the Nation. The farmers are entitled to the average cost of production and a reasonable profit for at least that portion of their products which is used for home consumption in the United States.

No business organization of any kind can make a success in any other way than by obtaining cost of production and a reasonable profit; the farmers are no exception to the rule, and, Mr. President, unless the farmers can get cost of production and a reasonable profit they are going to continue to "go broke" and to go out of business. We know what has happened to nations in the past when their agricultural interests have gone down and "gone broke." Those nations have "gone broke" along with their agriculture, as we are "going broke" now. The process started with the farmers; they were the ones who were first hit by the deflation that commenced back in 1920, and their condition has been going from bad to worse since that time. The prices of agricultural commodities have continued to go down, and the farmers are not getting anywhere near the cost of production. The so-called "pre-war parity price", I think, will help somewhat; but it does not go far enough to give the farmer cost of production, and he must have cost of production and a reasonable profit if he is going to win in his fight to continue as the owner of his land and his home and to feed the Nation, which he is called upon to do.

Mr. President, the farmers of America have been neglected too long. I have heard several Senators say, "It is all right to talk about assuring the farmers cost of production, but that cost cannot be determined." The cost of production of the farmers can be determined just as well as the costs of the merchant or the wholesaler or any other business. Some object because they say in the cost of production will be included interest on the capital investment. That is all right; but we have now many farmers in this country, substantially 50 percent of them, who have practically no capital investment; they have lost what little capital investment they had; they are today tenants or they are working by the day or by the month. They need a profit on all the commodities which they produce, and they should have it.

There are many business men who handle the products of the farmer who have also but little capital invested, and yet they succeed in making an exceedingly good profit. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], in discussing the amendment offered in regard to milk the other day, made the statement that a few years ago the farmers received seven and a half billion dollars for their products for the given year, while the consumers paid for those same products $22,000,000,000; in other words, it cost $15,000,000,000 to distribute the farm products during that year. The situation is about the same today. All new wealth comes from the soil; the farmers dig that wealth out of the soil. At the present time the farmer digs a dollar's worth of new wealth out of the soil. Some business concern gives him 30 cents for his dollar's worth of wealth, and, through their business organizations, they charge the consumers from a dollar and a half to $2 for that 30 cents which they pay for a dollar's worth of new wealth. Mr. President, that kind of distribution should not be allowed to continue; that kind of financing is not going to stand up; and the sooner we wake up to that fact in the United States Senate, the sooner we do something for agriculture that will put the farmers on a business basis and give them the average cost of production and a reasonable profit, the sooner the depression will end, and the sooner we will be on the upgrade to better times.

Mr. President, I hope that this amendment may be adopted, and that part 3 of the bill, known as the "cost-of-production plan", may also be retained in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, with regard to this particular amendment, I should like to say that I do not believe there is any insuperable difficulty in arriving at the average cost of production of a particular farm product. I realize, of course, the force of what has been said upon that point; and if that were the only ground of objection to this particular part of the bill I should be constrained to vote for it, because I think the cost of production can be ascertained with reasonable certainty, and the law does not require absolute certainty in any of its obligations.

Mr. President, I am troubled more about the other and far more serious questions involved in this proposal. I know that we have with a high degree of indifference passed many legislative acts that might have been subjected to very serious constitutional questioning. I also know that there is a disposition at times to raise constitutional questions simply because one does not favor a proposition. I am wholly unable, however, to see any ground upon which the validity of this particular part of the bill can possibly be sustained. In fact, I can imagine no provision of the Constitution and no power lodged in the Congress which would give to the Congress the authority which is sought to be conferred by part 3 upon the Secretary of Agriculture. But aside from that, Mr. President, we are attempting to do something that cannot be done by this Government or any other government, and that is to fix the minimum price of farm products without danger of disaster.

More than 16 centuries ago a famous Roman emperor undertook to fix the maximum price of farm products and other commodities in the interest of maintaining the military power of the Roman Empire. The scheme utterly collapsed. When part 3 of this bill was reached I asked whether it was a part of the administration measure as recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the author of the bill advised me that it was not a part of the administration measure.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator from Georgia if I correctly understood his implication when he spoke of the provisions of the bill not being mandatory? Does the Senator assume that the penalties in the bill do not apply in a mandatory way to the provision to which he has been alluding?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I think the Senator from Illinois must have misunderstood what I said. I did not say they were not mandatory. I said they simply could not be executed by the Government.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator for correcting my misunderstanding.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if this be a part of the administration's bill, then the President of the United States was wholly mistaken when he warned us, when the bill came down, that we were setting our feet in an untrodden path, because this path, Mr. President, is as marked in the field of economic history as Napoleon's march from Moscow.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRAZIER. During the World War we fixed the price of wheat and other commodities, and it worked. We have a greater emergency today than we had in the World War time. I believe it will work now, and I think it should be tried out.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I can only say that it never has worked. During an actual emergency, such as war, the Government, of course, has the power to do some things for the purpose of winning the war. It has the power, of course, to adopt any appropriate remedy to carry into effect and successful execution its power to wage war; but I am not discussing the constitutional aspect of the matter. I know that we cannot fix the price.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I do not wish it to stand in the RECORD here as if the food control bill succeeded during the war. I think it cost the wheat farmers a billion dollars. It cost the cotton farmers a half billion. It cost the farmers who raised hogs and cattle a billion or more; and no one has more ably reprobated that measure in the Senate and arraigned it for its injustices and its injuries to the farmers than the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

That measure, Mr. President, beat our farmers down to their knees. They have been staggering and stumbling to their fall from that day to this. It robbed the farmers of billions of dollars.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Government can pay a bounty on production. That involves simply the revenue of the Government, and its power to replenish that revenue. But the Government of the United States, whatever we may think about it, cannot fix and maintain the price of any product, because the price is controlled ultimately by the laws of economics, and not even this Government can do it. Governments have tried it. They have tried it, as I said before, for more than 2,000 years; and the path is clearly marked by ruins even as the route of any ruthless military leader in any time and in any country.

We can pay a bounty; and one part of this bill, which may be referred to as the allotment section, goes upon the theory that out of taxes raised, the price of the commodity on the market will be supplemented by a given amount. There is no insuperable economic objection to that proposal if the Government can live up to it; but so far as fixing and maintaining a price on any commodity is concerned, this Government can no more do it than any one of us, as individuals, can do it over any long period of time.

In recent years we have had the valorization of coffee. We have the story of rubber. I think, as I have already said, we can ascertain the cost of producing farm products. If that were the only objection to this part of the bill, I should be disposed to go along with it. I can find no authority whatever in the Constitution, of course, for this kind of legislation; but, aside from all that, I know that if the Government undertakes to fix prices we shall be no more successful than other governments have been. The same disastrous failure awaits the effort in the end, and the end is not very far off.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I cannot vote for the third part of this bill, because I cannot bring myself to believe for a moment that its provisions could be actually executed if no legal obstacle stood in the way, and if there were no facts which the Secretary of Agriculture is required to find that could not be readily ascertained or determined. I do not mean to say that the Government may not, through special legislation, favor particular industries. It may do that; and I have already said that the Government may pay a bounty on the production of specific articles. It may do that. Such was the export-debenture plan. That is the philosophy of that plan, and the allotment plan in the measure is based upon the same theory.

So far as the Government is concerned, however, by the simple enactment of legislation fixing for any length of time whatever a price which must be controlled by factors that operate throughout the world, and on that commodity wherever produced and wherever sold, I am conscious that this Government cannot accomplish that undertaking even if it were willing to put its hands to the task, that is to say, in my opinion; and for that reason I cannot support the third part of this bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] in his statement of fact. He does state an economic fact and an economic truth when he says that it is impossible for this Government or any other government successfully to fix prices. That is true; but the inference which he draws I am hardly able to follow.

He urges that as a reason against the adoption of the pending amendment. The fact that it is impossible to execute this provision ought not to stand in our way. Indeed, it ought not seriously to be considered. It seems to me, however, that an amendment to this measure requiring somebody, somewhere, to prepare a scale of impossibilities, and to show the varying degrees of impossibilities, might be a public service.

This is not, as the Senator says, either a new or an untrod path. I do not intend to discuss the dreary history of price fixing in the past. I had intended to do so, but the unanimous-consent agreement has rendered that impossible. It is, however, the dreariest chapter in the history of economics—I might almost say, in human history.

I had intended to begin with the first attempt which I have been able to discover. It occurred during the fifth dynasty in ancient Egypt, in the year 2830, under a commissioner known as Henku. The attempt seems to have failed; but succeeding generations have learned nothing from that failure and from that experience. This is one department of economics and of human history where experience speaks in vain.

Hammurabi, in ancient Babylon, more than 2,000 years before Christ, attempted a price-fixing scheme. The fact that it did not succeed has not discouraged succeeding generations of optimists.

Lik'o attempted the scheme in China 1,222 years before Christ, the most successful attempt ever made in human history.

But yesterday I read a speech made by the great Grecian orator Lysias, 400 years before Christ, against the grain dealers. A death penalty was provided for the violation of the laws of Athens regulating the purchase and sale of wheat. It did not succeed. But we must not balk at impossibilities. It is a sort of reflection on our omnipotence.

As suggested by the Senator from Georgia, Diocletian attempted this in the year 301. Diocletian had all the power there was. His power was not only supreme; it was absolute.

I was reading but yesterday a history written by Lactantius, 13 years after Diocletian's scheme had been attempted and had failed. Lactantius said that Diocletian fixed a maximum price on all vendible articles. He was thoroughgoing. He hesitated at nothing. He regulated all prices from knitting needles to elephants; the death penalty was attached. Lactantius shrewdly observed that the people ceased to bring provisions to market. The law failed; the law was repealed. It was, however, attempted 60 years later by Julian, with no better success. The hopes of the optimists who attempt the impossible are always cheated.

England attempted this sort of manipulation of prices for more than 5 centuries. In 1915, after an elaborate report by a parliamentary committee, she abandoned the vain pursuit.

Our fathers endeavored, during the Revolutionary War, to achieve the impossible. Many States early in that conflict attempted price regulation. In November 1777 Congress adopted a resolution urging all the States to make a similar attempt. Seven months later, June 4, 1778, Congress adopted a resolution urging the Colonies to repeal their price-fixing legislation. John Adams said that if the measure was not repealed, it would ruin the country if it did not lead to civil war. They had attempted the impossible. They tried to achieve the impossible. They tried to resist the inevitable, but with indifferent success.

As already stated, we attempted this during the recent war, and it resulted in grief to our farmers. The Senator from North Dakota will verify what I say, that farmers in Oklahoma and in North Dakota were compelled to sell their wheat at $1.80 a bushel, when the peasant farmers of Europe were receiving from $3 to $4.18 a bushel.

I opposed the food control bill. I opposed it on the ground that it was unconstitutional. I opposed it on the ground that it was uneconomic. The Supreme Court held that it was unconstitutional. Two million farmers held last November that it was uneconomic.

Mr. President, I am willing to support any and every measure for farm relief which I believe is constitutional and which I believe will do more good than harm. That test is not unreasonable. Perhaps I have less faith than I should have in such schemes, in such dreams. I confess I am powderburnt.

Mr. President, let me say this: Someone said—I believe it was Walter Bagehot—that the United States is a great laboratory, where we continue to test and retest self-evident truths. I see no reason peculiar to this experiment why it should be excluded from this bill. The bill itself is an admitted experiment—and one experiment more or less cannot change the stars in their course. If we are to have a museum of experiments or a laboratory, why not try them all and try them again? Senators are too faint-hearted, who hesitate merely on account of the impossibility of the plan.

I wish to have read at this point an extract from one who I think is one of the greatest living economists. Senators seem to think that price fixing is a liberal movement.

Tinker with prices! Tamper with prices! I wish to cite a high authority to the contrary. Just as this country is reversing a policy, a policy of interfering with the daily concerns of daily life, when our people have revolted at such a policy, we are embarking upon a similar policy in a different direction. It will be doomed to the same fate.

I ask to have read the article which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[Extract from article by T. N. Carver, American Economic Review, March 1919, pp. 246–247]

Parallel with the path of progress from autocracy to democracy lies another path which leads from authority to liberty, from coercion to persuasion, from getting things done by appealing to fear to getting them done by appealing to hope, from a condition under which everyone does what he is commanded to do by someone in authority to a condition under which he does what he is persuaded voluntarily to do by some free citizen with no more authority than himself.

A general policy of price fixing, however democratic the government that adopts it, is an illiberal rather than a liberal policy. It involves an extension of the field of authority and compulsion and a restriction of the field of persuasion and voluntary agreement.

For centuries before 1776 medieval governments were trying to fix prices. Much of the economic discussion among the precursors of Adam Smith was concerned with the question of justum pretium or just price. What is a just price and how can it be determined, was a great economic problem of those times when governments were directing everybody in all the affairs of life.

The great liberal movement of the latter part of the eighteenth century and the early nineteenth century swept all these errors away, and aroused trust in the people so that they began to arrange these matters for themselves in the free atmosphere of the open market. This liberating of enterprise and industry from the hampering influence of groups of officeholders anxious to enlarge their authority was followed by the greatest burst of prosperity that the world has ever known. If we adopt a general, undiscriminating policy of price fixing as a part of a permanent peace program, we shall be going backward rather than forward; we shall be returning to a regime of authority and compulsion rather than going forward toward a regime of voluntary agreement among free citizens.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask to have another paragraph from Mr. Carver printed in the RECORD, and also a brief extract from Miss Mary G. Lacy, librarian in the Department of Agriculture.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Principles of National Economy]

By Thomas Nixon Carver

What the liberalist believes. A liberalist in economics is one who believes in the freedom of the individual rather than in compulsion, either by the mass or by a despot. He relies mainly but not exclusively upon individual initiative. He believes that individuals will, without compulsion and under freedom of contract, do whatever is necessary to provide for the needs of the community. He believes that it is not necessary continually to impose upon the individual the authority either of a benevolent despot or of a well-meaning majority. In somewhat extreme cases, such as can be covered by the criminal law, laws for the enforcement of contracts and other obligations, and laws for the standardization of various aspects of business, compulsion is necessary and helpful. He believes that the interests of the public are expressed quite as accurately on the market and through the price lists as through the ballot box and the statute books. He believes even that poverty and most of the social ills can be eliminated under the system of voluntary agreement—freedom to accumulate, to own, and to operate private property—and without subjecting individuals to the necessity of becoming Government employees.

[From the Scientific Monthly, June 1923]

The history of government limitation of prices seems to teach one clear lesson: That in attempting to ease the burdens of the people in a time of high prices by artificially setting a limit to them, the people are not relieved but only exchange one set of ills for another which is greater. Among these ills are (1) the withholding of goods from the market; (2) the dividing of the community into two hostile camps, one only of which considers that the Government acts in its interest; (3) the practical difficulties of enforcing such limitation in prices which in the very nature of the case requires the cooperation of both producer and consumer to make it effective.

Egypt took entire control of the grain trade and saved the people from starvation, but took over the land in return.

China worked out a system of control of supply and demand which kept prices normal. She seems to have been the only country which recognized the whole price question as being a symptom and not the disease itself, and because she recognized this fact seems to have come nearer than any other country to solving the problem of supplying the people with the food they needed at a price they could pay.

Athens regulated the grain trade and set prices by legal enactment, but found herself unable to enforce them.

Rome made a colossal experiment in controlling prices by legal enactment, but it utterly failed.

Great Britain had on her statute books laws fixing the price of bread continuously for more than 500 years. The price of wheat, fish, and wine was also regulated, but all such laws were abrogated in 1815 because of their failure to accomplish the purpose for which they were designed.

The Dutch Republic was overthrown in 1585, and at least one historian of note declares that price-fixing legislation was largely responsible for its downfall.

India has learned in the hard school of experience that even in times of famine price fixing is a very dangerous expedient, because it removes one of the most powerful checks on consumption, namely, high prices.

The colonial United States tried the same experiment at various places and times but failed utterly to secure satisfactory results.

Revolutionary France tried the same measures, but the protagonists of the movement perished on the guillotine. The dreary story of France's efforts to limit prices is distinguished from that of the other countries we have noted because of the proposal of Barbaroux to enlist the aid of both producer and consumer in the effort of the Government to control the food supply in the interest of the people's welfare. This proposition was not carried out, but it furnished the first indication of the goal of cooperation toward which we are still pressing.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the very few minutes left to me I want first to express my sorrow that the Senator from North Dakota has offered his amendment. It is an amendment which every friend of the farmer, of course, would like to see put into law, but we are confronted here with a combined opposition, led on this side by the Republican leader and on the other side by the Democratic leader, against the committee amendment. If we add the Senator's amendment to the committee amendment, we are only putting another monkeywrench into the machinery that is confronting us now.

We discussed the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota in the committee, and agreed, I think, with the exception of the Senator himself, unanimously, that as a matter of strategy it was unwise to put that amendment into the bill, because we knew the terrible opposition with which we would be confronted on the floor of the Senate, and we did not want to do anything to the committee amendment which might give additional reasons for voting against it. That is the reason why we left it out. That is the reason why the committee amendment came into the Senate without anything being said about a reasonable profit.

Everybody can see what we are confronted with—a combined opposition here, which, under any ordinary circumstances would be sufficient to overturn any movement, and if we add the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, we will only be adding to the means by which we shall go down to defeat on the committee amendment.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma told us about the terrible thing that happened when they tried to fix prices 1,000 years before Christ. His next argument was dated 400 years before Christ, and the next one was just a few years after the birth of Christ. The attempt did not work then, and the next argument is that it has never worked, except in time of war.

I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have lived several centuries since that time, that the old standpat theories of a thousand years before Christ should not apply to this modern age, of which we boast, and which we call the civilized age of modern times.

Mr. President, it is worse than a time of war. I would not be for this amendment under any ordinary conditions. This whole bill would not be here under normal conditions. Nothing that went so far as this would probably be necessary even in time of war.

During the great World War there never was a moment when anybody doubted but that our Government was going to survive, and that the war was not going to extinguish us as a nation. But our entire civilization is at stake in this war. We have more than the World War confronting us. The life of our Nation here is at stake 10,000 times more than it ever was during the World War, or during any other war in which we have ever been engaged. Yet those who want to save our civilization, those who want to save our country by protecting the foundation stone both of our country and of our civilization, are ridiculed; we are called foolish and silly, and the argument is made that this amendment is unconstitutional. Perhaps it is. I think under ordinary conditions a court would hold it unconstitutional, but in these times the court is going farther, if it is moved by motives which ought to move a court under these conditions of stress, than it ever went to uphold an act in time of war, because we are in more danger than we ever were in war.

Mr. President, it seems to me to be foolish to confine the constitutional argument to this amendment. Apply it to every other provision in the bill. Apply it to the other two parts of the bill. If this amendment is unconstitutional, I say that there is not a hope on earth for the other provisions based on constitutional grounds.

I am willing, as I said before, to try the experiment. The whole bill is an experiment, and wise men, patriotic men of all kinds, have been trying to meet the emergency, and the first part of the bill is a part of the results of their deliberations.

Mr. GORE rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I have only 2 minutes left, and necessarily I cannot yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. No one knows what the outcome is going to be, but we are like a drowning man grasping at a straw. The farmers of this Nation are not going to be peasants, they are not going to be bound down as slaves, they are not going to submit to what the farmers in the days 1,100 years before Christ, about which the Senator has been telling us, submitted. We are living in a different age. We have come to the time now when the life of our Nation and of our people depends upon something being done to save these struggling, honest, patriotic mortals from destruction. The reverse of the proposition is slavery for our people, for our farmers.

I do not mean that the bill will bring complete relief. It will not bring permanent relief. We will have to do something besides this. This is only a step, and I think it is only a short step. If Senators will read the report of the committee, they will find there that the committee unanimously stated, in substance, that this bill in its entirety would not cure the evils which confront agriculture, that it would only help, that it would be only a palliative, that we have to have some other fundamental financial legislation in order to make it possible for the farmers of the United States as well as the 12,000,000 unemployed to live and get jobs.

Mr. President, we must reach other avenues of legislation. We must reduce the value of the dollar, so that the men in debt will be able to pay what they owe, and in that way we will raise the prices of commodities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question recurs upon the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to know when the agreement was entered into to vote on the committee amendment at this time without further debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement was made late yesterday afternoon.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Was it agreed to after a quorum call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no quorum call.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Why was there no quorum call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule did not require it under the wording of the agreement.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I want to register my objection to entering into any agreement regarding limitation of debate without the calling of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There can be no debate at this time. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee, on page 25, line 17, after the word "production," by inserting the words "including therein a reasonable profit," so as to read:

> The average domestic cost of production, including therein a reasonable profit, for the commodity.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send forward to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Kansas offers the following amendment to the amendment of the committee: On page 25, line 20, after the word "person", insert the words "engaged in the business of buying and selling a commodity or commodities as a dealer therein", so as to read:

> After such date as shall be specified in the proclamation it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in the business of buying and selling a commodity or commodities as a dealer therein to purchase any amount of the commodity from the producer or any association of producers at a price, for the domestic-consumption percentage thereof, that is less than the proclaimed cost of production for the commodity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments? If not, the question recurs upon the adoption of the committee amendment as amended, set forth on page 25, being "Part 3. Cost of Production."

Mr. BARKLEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. FESS (when his name was called). On this amendment I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], who is unavoidably absent from the Chamber attending a funeral. Therefore, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. HARRISON (after having voted in the negative). Mr. President, I wish to change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 41, as follows:

NOT VOTING—7

Ashurst	Dale	Fess	Thomas, Utah
Bankhead	Davis	King

So the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment just agreed to was adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not made the motion as yet.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, Mr. President, I make the motion to reconsider and then I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the question pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, a parlimantary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BONE. Is a vote in the affirmative a vote to table the motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. As I understood, the Senator from Nebraska made a motion to reconsider and to table that motion at the same time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He did.

Mr. FESS. The question is whether that is in order.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. As I understand, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asked leave to spread on the minutes a motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He did.

Mr. CONNALLY. May the Senator from Nebraska call that up of his own motion, or is it not subject to the control of the Senator from Mississippi?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska himself made the motion to reconsider, and then moved to lay his own motion on the table, and the Parliamentarian advises the Chair that that is in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Regular order!

Mr. CONNALLY. There is a motion to reconsider, made by the Senator from Mississippi, already spread on the record.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely said that I would enter the motion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Regular order!

Mr. HARRISON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not quite finished my inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Mississippi gave notice that he entered the motion on the record. Can the Chair now entertain a different motion to reconsider? Does not the motion of the Senator from Mississippi take precedence?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the one case the actual motion was not made, while in the other case it was made, and the Chair had to take into consideration what was actually done. The Chair was advised by the Parliamentarian that it was in order for the Senator from Nebraska to make the motion to reconsider and then to move to lay it on the table; that course is being pursued, and the roll is being called.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Regular order!

Mr. HARRISON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. If the nays prevail, then a motion to reconsider the vote is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order; that would be the next question.

Mr. LONG. If the yeas prevail, then we will vote as we did before. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the yeas prevail, the amendment is adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. If the yeas prevail, it is simply completing what we did when we previously voted on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the yeas prevail, the amendment as amended is agreed to.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. AUSTIN (after having voted in the negative). I announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is temporarily absent from the Senate. I feel at liberty, however, to let my vote stand.

Mr. HEBERT. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

I further desire to announce the general pair on this question of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 41, as follows:

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I address the Chair for the purpose of asking a unanimous-consent agreement. It is with regard to taking up H.R. 4220, Order of Business No. 22. It is a bill to protect public records, and prevent the exposure of diplomatic communications obtained by those in the employment of our Government.

I think it is an emergency matter. It has been so presented to us by the State Department. I do not believe it will take more than a very few minutes to act upon it. I understand that the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has some remarks to make with regard to it, and also the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON].

I ask to have the substitute for the bill read before making the request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reading of the substitute?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the consideration of this bill can be expedited by my simply stating that I think it is in the interest of expedition and progress to go ahead with the unfinished business, and I shall object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to speak for a few minutes upon the pending bill as a whole.

I sincerely believe that it offers the most serious threat to the welfare of the workingmen of America that has been presented to them in those decades in which I have had any knowledge of the American Government; and I believe that in the guise of offering relief to the farmers of the country, in reality this bill would impose upon them a slavery which they would find to be utterly intolerable.

Both of those propositions I shall try, as well as I may, to develop.

I think I am safe in saying that there are not half a dozen Senators in this Chamber who sincerely believe that the bill is constitutional. I know that many Senators will vote for it on the theory that a matter of constitutionality is, in the last analysis, to be decided by the Supreme Court, and that they will in effect shrug their shoulders and pass the responsibility over to that great tribunal.

I hope to be able to show briefly that there are five distinct reasons why the bill cannot be sustained by that court; but I realize from sad experience that we who make long, exhaustive constitutional arguments in this Chamber are really but wasting the time of our colleagues and of ourselves. So I shall not devote any lengthy argument to the matter of constitutionality, merely calling attention to the reasons why I think the bill is unconstitutional, and citing the most recent cases that lay down the principles that I know will apply as well as anyone can know a future event, and then passing on to a discussion of the bill on the theory that it is entirely constitutional, and discussing it only from the standpoint of its fairness and workability.

To begin with, the bill is based upon a false premise—a premise that the farmers of the United States are in a worse case than are the industrial workers in the more concentrated communities.

I know full well that the price of farm products has sunk to a smaller percentage of its predepression level than has the price of most manufactured products, but that is only a part of the picture. If we will consider it from the standpoint of the income of the citizen, we will realize that the farmer is getting approximately 50 percent of his predepression prices for his entire crop, and that nature is working for him just as it was before the depression; and his output is a full output, on which he gets a 50-percent price. Then consider, on the other hand, the situation of the worker in industry, and we realize that he has suffered a very substantial diminution of his prices; and, besides that, an additional diminution in his output. The combination of those factors—diminished prices and diminished output—means that the income of the average urban worker today is a lower percentage of his predepression income than is the farmer's present-day income.

That is to say, to sum it up in a word, the farmer has suffered from a shrinkage in prices, it is true, but he has not had a shrinkage in output. The city worker, on the other hand, has suffered a shrinkage in both respects; so that today the average city worker's income is a smaller proportion of his predepression income than is the income of the farmer. That thesis needs no elaboration to make its veracity plain; and yet this bill proceeds upon the premise that the factory worker, the industrial worker, is in better case than the farmer, and therefore we should exercise our taxing power to lift from the worker in industry a part of his earnings and give it bodily to the worker on the farm.

That is the essential premise of the bill; and I submit to you, Mr. President, that it is a false premise.

The bill comes to us as an administration measure. It comes to us with a statement that the whole theory of the bill is itself experimental, and that the President, who recommends its passage, does not himself know whether the bill will be workable or whether it will not. That used to be an argument against a bill, Mr. President. To call it experimental was to denounce it; and yet here in the President's message we have that epithet applied to it as if it were a term of commendation for the legislation which he sends us.

Experiment? Why, he is experimenting with the vital necessities of all the population of the United States—an experiment that cannot possibly benefit the 60 percent of our population that is not engaged in agriculture; an experiment that goes to the very vitals of a sick nation. What a time for an experiment and what a subject for an experiment that is!

The term "experiment" is a disclaimer of all of the confident assurance that President Roosevelt gave us during his campaign when he told us repeatedly that he had a remedy for the farm troubles which was practical and workable, and he used those adjectives over and over again; and now, when he submits it to us, he announces that instead of being practical and workable it is an experiment. What a poor fulfillment of a promise that gave high hope to needy Americans!

He told us not long ago, in the last short session of the Congress, that he was "horrified" at our proposal to balance the Budget by putting a 2-percent sales tax on all articles of commerce other than food and clothing. He was horrified at that, and yet that tax was for the general purposes of government. It was not to be given to a particular class. It carefully exempted the essential necessities of life. It would not have applied to rent, to food, to clothing, to medicines. This bill at which he is not horrified will put a sales tax of more than 100 percent upon the essentials of living of the poorest people in America.

It seems to me that his horror is very ill-regulated if it bursts into flame at the proposal of a 2-percent sales tax on nonnecessities, and yet lies dormant at this horrible sales tax on the very articles that are needed to keep body and soul together in this depression.

Mr. President, in times of prosperity the Department of Labor has determined that the average workingman spends about 32 percent of his income for the food of himself and his family. Inevitably, as income shrinks that proportion increases, so that men who are working but half-time—as so many of us are these days—find themselves spending all their income for shelter and for food. Precious little of it goes for clothing. Nothing of it goes for the other purposes for which the workingman was able to spend in times of prosperity. Consequently, if by this law we double the cost of foodstuffs to the poorest elements of our population, we are doubling the cost not of that 32 percent but probably of 60 or 70 percent of the spending of the average workman of America.

Think of it, Mr. President! The money is not there to double the spending. It cannot be. Inevitably, what we are doing is cutting his consumption in half. He will spend for the food of his family and himself the same amount that he is spending now, but he is not getting an adequate food supply in millions of homes at the present time; and we propose by this bill to cut that food supply in half. That is practically what we are doing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Senator seen a statement that has been prepared indicating the allocation of costs to the various States, offsetting the allocation of benefits to the farmers in the various States?

Mr. REED. I have, and it is shocking. For example, the State of Rhode Island will pay into fund from 75 to 100 times as much as it will get back from the fund. The farmers of Rhode Island themselves will pay into the fund approximately as much as they get out of it, and the city population of Rhode Island pays about seven and a half millions and gets nothing out of it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I was wondering if the Senator would permit me to insert in the RECORD at this point the table to which we are both referring.

Mr. REED. Yes; I should be glad to have that done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table is as follows:

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask who made up the table?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I can answer that so far as my information goes. I have sought figures from all possible sources and have been able to get them only from the National Millers' Association, and it is my understanding that the computations come from that source.

Mr. REED. That is the source from which my table came.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I yield this time, but I am not going to yield after this time. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am only asking the Senator to yield this time, and he is very good to yield. I will not ask him any more, in view of his announcement.

It would be interesting to know how the figures which have been inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Michigan were prepared, and the basis of them; how it is known what will be consumed in any State; how it is known how much will be consumed in a given State; and how much the cost will be, since there has been no announcement of the alleged increased purchasing power contemplated by the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I make just one observation in reply, and then I will subside?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I must thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for yielding to me.

Mr. REED. I am glad to have yielded.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that it would be amazingly interesting to know how the figures were prepared, because the whole formula has been so utterly inscrutable to me that I cannot contemplate how they were made. Nevertheless, they are submitted as the minimum probabilities.

Mr. REED. I have not heard them contradicted myself, but I have no knowledge of their accuracy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further statement?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is astonishing that the Senator would make that statement as an implied assertion of the accuracy of the figures. It can have no other effect. There has been no opportunity to study them, so far as I know. They have not been published, as far as my information goes, until just this minute.

Mr. REED. They were sent to me about 2 weeks ago, and I have not heard them challenged. I admit that is scant proof of their authenticity.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Did the Senator publish them?

Mr. REED. No; I did not; but they were sent in printed form, and I assumed that every Senator had received them. However, be that wrong or right, it does not matter to me for my present purposes. The figures I gave about the proportion of the family budget that goes for food in prosperous times are those of the Department of Labor, and I think we all assume that they are correct.

Mr. President, back in the days of Louis the Sixteenth, under one of the most unfair systems of government that ever disgraced this earth, the peasants of France were being taxed about 55 percent on their expenditures for food and clothing. Taking into account the salt taxes and the other cruel impositions that were put upon the backs of those people, the tax totaled, in all, about 55 percent on the expenditures of the people for living purposes, practically all for food and clothing, as I have said. Most of them lived in houses of their own. The unfairness of taxing that group of lowest income earners, a tax which, in effect, was a 55-percent income tax, led to one of the most bitter revolutions in the world's history.

Mr. President, how do Senators suppose the population of our cities, undernourished as they are in these dreadful times, are going to submit to a tax of over 100 percent on their cereals, on their meats, on their textiles, because all of them are going to be taxed under one section or another of this bill. How long are they going to submit to that? How long can we successfully explain to them that they are being subjected to a burden so cruel, not for the general purposes of their Government, but so that a particular group of farmers, most of them in the upper Mississippi Valley and in Texas, are to be given these vast sums as a bounty on their production?

How are we to explain to a city worker who has been evicted for nonpayment of rent, and is living on a four and a half dollar food order for his family for a week, that we are cutting in half the value of that food order for the benefit of a fellow countryman in the Middle West, who has his home, who has a roof over his head, who raises a large part of his necessary food, that we are taking from the poorer to give to the citizen who is better off?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. For a question; yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. The Senator mentioned raising the price of cereals. I hope any little increase in this bill would not increase the price of cereals. At the present prices of cereals they figure $10 or $15 a bushel for the grain they are made of.

Mr. REED. I am talking of grains generally. A tax on wheat, which in Chicago has been selling for around 45 to 50 cents, is now to be put on to the tune of 60 cents, a tax of 120 percent, approximately. Explain that, if you can, to the man in the bread line, when he finds that his food order brings him in only half as much, that his family has to live on the same amount of food that today could be bought for $2.25. Tell him that he is going to have to live on half as much food, that his children will get half as much milk, and see how he takes it. I think I know without trying to experiment how he will take it.

Our Supreme Court has said over and over again that in industries not affected by a public interest, as they describe it, such as railroads and public utilities and grain elevators, it is not within the power of the legislature to fix prices. They have said that in several recent cases, to which I will presently call the attention of the Senate. Unless they throw all of those decisions out the window, this bill is necessarily invalid.

The bill's principal motive is price fixing, and its advocates admit that. The bill delegates to the Secretary of Agriculture broader power than the American Congress ever gave to any official, the President or any other official, in peace time. It delegates to him the power to fix prices. It delegates to him the power to tax. It delegates to him the power to license or refuse to license the operation of a lawful business which is not, by any stretch of the imagination, a public utility. That is the power, in essence, which is given to the Secretary of Agriculture.

If he exercises it—and every bureaucrat exercises all the power we give him—it means that we are vesting in Secretary Wallace the control of approximately one half of the industry of the United States, that he can license or refuse to license particular establishments, that he can attach conditions to the license, on breach of which the license will be revoked. It makes him absolute czar over American industry, and when we look to see his qualifications for that powerful position, we find that he could not even keep his own business out of receivership, but that last fall his Wallace Homestead Co., which is the business to which he has devoted his life, itself went into receivership.

Does that bode well for the future of American industry, to give that gentleman absolute, despotic power over the processing of any textile or any food product in the United States? Can we look forward with confidence to his administration of American industry in gross, when he could not do better than that in detail?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It just occurs to me that, in view of the large number of concerns which have gone into receivership during the last 3 or 4 years, and the large number of others which would have landed there but for the credit of the Government's being brought to their assistance, it is hardly a fair criterion of a man's ability to refer to the fact that his particular business went into the hands of receivers.

Mr. REED. I do not refer to it as being any disgrace to him.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Let me finish the sentence. I do say that Secretary Wallace is quite unknown to most of us, and when we look for his business history, look for his business experience, that is what we find. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. Would the Senator say that in every case in his knowledge where a business has not prospered in the last 3 years it shows lack of intelligence on the part of those in charge of the business?

Mr. REED. Not at all. I did not mean to imply that.

Mr. BYRNES. What did the Senator mean to imply by the statement, then, that this business of the Secretary of Agriculture was not prosperous within the last few years? The Senator certainly implied that he feared that he would not be able intelligently to administer this proposed law.

Mr. REED. Not a bit of it. I was looking for encouragement. I hoped that I would find something in this gentleman's record that would testify to his unusual skill to carry on these unusual responsibilities, and I am telling the Senate what I found.

Mr. BYRNES. Would the Senator say that in every case where, in his own acquaintance, and among his friends, a corporation has not been successful in the last 2 years, he finds no encouragement, then, in passing upon their intelligence?

Mr. REED. The Senator does not understand me. I can only hope that the President and the other Senators will understand me better.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. I simply wanted to ask the Senator why we could not have been that fair to the little country banks that were put to death because they failed? If nothing is to be held against Secretary Wallace because he failed, why did we break the little banks because they failed?

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. One feature of this bill has not been referred to very much on the floor, and that is an amendment which was put into the bill by the House, scrapping completely the Civil Service law so far as it relates to the great organization to be built up under the bill.

There are something over 3,000 counties in the United States. In every one of those counties there must be inspectors, examiners, and accountants, inspectors to see whether the farmers are living up to their agreements to restrict their acreage and cut down their production, examiners to find out what kind of agreements are to be made with the farmers for the coming year, accountants because the Secretary of Agriculture has power to prescribe the way everybody is to have to keep his books, just the way the Interstate Commerce Commission lays down the law for the railroads. All that great body of employees are to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture without regard, says the bill, to the present civil service laws.

This emergency, which we say justifies the passage of the bill, is to last until the President says it is over. I am made cynical by experience, I suppose, but I doubt whether the emergency will be decreed to be over until after the election of 1936. Think what a political sword that places in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture; and I would say the same if the bill came from a Republican President. It is destruction to the civil service law, which has been won for the United States after so many decades of effort. It is indefensible, when our civil-service rosters are jammed to overflowing, to say that in a selection of these employees those rosters and eligible lists are to be ignored; and that is just what this bill does say.

In the long run, the bill means the ruination of agriculture, and to realize that we need to give only a moment's thought to the way it will work out. Let us suppose that in a farming region it is desired to limit the production of wheat. The examiners and inspectors, or whatever they may be called, go to that county. They find that 78 farmers in the county last year were raising wheat. They had so many acres sown in wheat. The bill provides that agreements shall be made with those farmers to sow only a given proportion of that acreage in wheat this year. All right; so far so good. If they do that they get paid a bounty, and the net result of it is to put up the price of wheat to around 90 cents. That is all very simple as regards those farmers.

But here is John Smith on the next farm who last year had his land sowed in some other crop, or perhaps a part of it was fallow. There is nothing in the bill that is going to authorize him to make an agreement to cut down his proportion of the previous year because he did not have any production in the previous year. Consequently the agreement with the wheat producers of this year does not at all bar an enormous wheat production from being called out by the high price on all the lands on which wheat was not grown last year. All the farmers who did not grow wheat last year at once see a premium in planting their land in wheat this year, and they will do it unless they are prevented. How can they be prevented? We look to the bill to see, because if they are not prevented the whole plan goes to smash. We look to the bill to see how John Jones, who did not plant wheat last year, is going to be prevented from planting it this year. By regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture, John Jones is going to be told that he has to keep himself out of this picture and not upset the smooth working of the bill. The Secretary of Agriculture says, "Jones, no wheat from you."

What is Jones going to think about it? Perhaps he will be told the same thing about other crops to which he would like to transfer, crops that are carrying bounties under the bill. Every way he turns to get the advantages of the high prices he is met by a fiat from Washington, "Jones, you cannot plant that." How long is John Jones, the typical American farmer, going to continue taking orders from a political county agent appointed from Washington about what he shall sow and what he shall not sow on the land that he owns? I do not think he would keep it up very long. He will say, "You are making a slave out of me. I am an American and I am not a slave. I will not take your orders, but I will plant what I please." Then either the measure breaks down or we have to go out and arrest John Jones for producing a desirable harmless article on his own property by his own labor. What a situation to have prevailing in the farming country in the United States. Meanwhile the city population is writhing under a 100 percent sales tax to make such a system possible in the country districts.

Mr. President, another thing. The immediate effect of the bill is going to be to increase the cost of all products manufactured from basic agricultural products. With an agricultural price double that of the world market, how in the world can the manufactured products of American agriculture hope to compete in the markets of the world with those from other countries? How can an American packing plant, paying 100 percent more for its raw material, compete with a British packing plant, to which the bill provides we shall sell at the world level and not at the pegged price? It means the immediate extinction of American exports in products manufactured from the basic products of agriculture.

Then again we dream of shipping wheat and other raw agricultural products to foreign countries. We provide that when that is done—and it is in the bill—the processing tax shall be refunded to the exporter. Does anyone suppose that the other countries of the world will be slow in applying their antidumping legislation to that situation? Are they going to let Americans sell wheat at 90 cents in America and at 45 cents in Liverpool? I venture to think they will not, any more than we would submit to that kind of dumping if any other country tried it on us. Not only will our manufactured products be barred from entry because of their high cost but our raw products will be barred from entry because they plainly will violate the antidumping clauses of the laws of these foreign countries. It means utter devastation to the export trade of America in agricultural products and articles manufactured from agricultural products.

Furthermore, we talk of raising the farmer's income. I should like to ask the Senate to consider for a moment whether the amount by which we raise the farmer's income is comparable at all with the amount by which we diminish the standard of living of the city worker. Obviously, a 100 percent sales tax means we are cutting in half the standard of living in the city dwellers. That is self-evident. What are we doing to the farmer? Are we doubling his income? If we were, there might seem to be a rough sort of compensation in this bill for the injury we are doing to the man in the city. But we are not doubling the farmer's income. We are doubling the price of his products, I grant you, but we are cutting down the volume of his products if the plan works. We are saying to the farmer, "Yes; we will double the price of your wheat, but you must not grow more than three fifths of what you are growing this year." Therefore, instead of the farmer getting $100, we will say, for his wheat, he is getting twice as much per unit for three fifths of the amount of wheat. In other words, he is getting six fifths of this year's income in return for next year's wheat. We will raise his income 20 per cent at a cost to the consumer of 100 per cent. The arithmetic of it works out very simply that way.

I do not know that I have stated it clearly. The farmer, we will say, is getting $1,000 for this year's wheat. If he gets the same price next year on three fifths of the production, he would only be getting $600; but we are doubling his price, so he will get $1,200 for next year's wheat by producing three fifths as much. We have raised him in his income from $1,000 to $1,200, a 20 per cent raise for him, and yet the wheat to the consumer is raised 100 per cent in cost; so that the benefits to those who receive the bounties under the bill are very much less than the hardships to those who have to bear the burden. I think the arithmetic of that is plain.

Mr. President, I have said that I am not going to weary the Senate with a long discussion on constitutional points, but I want the RECORD to show that those points were raised, that we who are sworn to respect the Constitution, to uphold and defend it, had our attention called to the points while the matter was still open for us to reach a different conclusion. The oath that we take to uphold and support the Constitution of this country is not limited to times when no emergencies exist. It applies at all times. It is not limited to measures that do not come from the White House. It applies to all measures. If the oath is binding on us at any time, it is binding upon us now.

First, the bill is utterly unconstitutional because there has been conferred upon Congress no power in itself to fix prices of articles that are not of public use. For authority upon that point and for a case which cites many other preceding cases I refer to Williams v. The Standard Oil Co. (278 U.S. 235), decided January 2, 1929. That opinion held that it was not within the power of the Legislature of Louisiana to fix the price at which gasoline might be sold in that State. In spite of the fact that gasoline was an article of commerce in which the entire population was interested, in spite of the fact that the whole community was interested in the maintenance of a reasonable price, the court held that it was not within the legislative power to fix the price of gasoline and that it did not make any difference that the act declared that the price of gasoline was imbued with a public interest and that it should therefore be regulated by law. That case, now 4 years old, has not been overruled or qualified by any decision, so far as I know.

Then we have a clearly established principle that it is not within the power of Congress or of the legislature to tax one citizen in order to give the proceeds to another. I should like to cite 2 or 3 cases on that point. But before I do that I had better add another citation on the other point because it comes very close home. In the case of Fairmont Creamery Co. v. Minnesota (274 U.S. 1) the Supreme Court of the United States decided that it was not within the legislative power of the State of Minnesota to fix the price to be paid for cream within that State. If that is not in point, it is difficult to find a case that is, because it dealt with the price to be paid for an agricultural product. The legislature endeavored to establish a uniform price throughout the State and it made it a penal offense to pay a price lesser or greater—I forget which—for that particular agricultural product. In a decision rendered April 11, 1927, the Supreme Court of the United States held the statute unconstitutional and void.

Coming now to the next point, the power to tax one citizen in order to pay to another, that is an old principle. Bearing upon it I find such cases as Savings and Loan Association v. Topeka (87 U.S. 65).

What the Court said there was, in part:

> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

I do not believe that the Supreme Court is going to forget that it said that when this bill comes before it.

In Parkersburg v. Brown (105 U.S. 487) the Supreme Court condemned the use of the taxing power to take one person's property for the private use of another. The city had issued certain bonds which were loaned to persons engaging in manufacturing. The Court said in part:

> Taxation to pay the bonds in question is not taxation for a public object. It is taxation which takes the private property of one person for the private use of another person.

And they struck down the statute as unconstitutional and void.

In Cole v. Lagrange (113 U.S. 1) the Court said in part:

> Nor can the legislature authorize counties, cities, or towns to contract for private objects debts which must be paid by taxes. It cannot, therefore, authorize them to issue bonds to assist merchants or manufacturers, whether natural persons or corporations, in their private business. These limits of the legislative power are now too firmly established by judicial decisions to require extended argument upon the subject.

The bill before us proposes to tax the consumers of agricultural products for the sole and only purpose of giving the proceeds of such tax to the producers of those products. I cannot believe the Supreme Court will forget what it has said in the cases I have cited.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator not think that that is exactly the theory on which we enact the tariff?

Mr. REED. No; I do not.

Mr. BLACK. Is not tariff enacted for the purpose of increasing the price of commodities that are sold?

Mr. REED. It is for the purpose of giving the American market to the American workman.

Mr. BLACK. It is, however, a tax for the benefit of the American manufacturer, is it not?

Mr. REED. No; I do not think so.

Mr. BLACK. But, of course, the Senator agrees that the tariff is a tax?

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. BLACK. Then, is it for the benefit of the foreign manufacturer?

Mr. REED. The tax is for the benefit of the Federal Treasury; it goes into the Federal Treasury and is kept there and is spent for general public purposes.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator, then, does not concede that it is for the benefit of the American manufacturer?

Mr. REED. I concede that the American manufacturers would go out of business if that tax policy were not adopted.

Mr. BLACK. Then the American manufacturer gets a direct benefit; it permits him to remain in business, and it is a tax.

Mr. REED. But that is an incidental result of the tax. The tax itself goes into the Public Treasury; but this proposed tax will not. There is the distinction.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania one other question in line with the opinion of the Supreme Court? The money that goes to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is raised by taxes, is it not?

Mr. REED. It is raised by public borrowing, which will have to be paid by taxes.

Mr. BLACK. Is not that for the benefit of private business?

Mr. REED. The Senator from Alabama need not wave the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at me. I doubt very gravely whether we have the power to tax the American people for the purpose of loaning money to banks, insurance companies, and railroads.

Mr. BLACK. I so stated during the time the bill was under consideration, but, as I recall, I could not persuade the Senator from Pennsylvania to vote with me.

Mr. REED. I regret to say that I voted for the bill as an emergency measure. I have been very sorry since that I did, and I have repeatedly said so publicly.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator does believe, though, that it comes squarely within the case which he has just cited?

Mr. REED. I am inclined to think it does; and I wish someone would test it out in the Court.

Mr. BLACK. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. In reference to the proposition laid down in the first two cases cited by the Senator, did the court lay any stress upon the inhibitions of State constitutions against the impairment of contracts or price fixing?

Mr. REED. No. Wherever that question has arisen in these cases it has been discussed on the basis of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution as impairing the freedom of contract, a prohibition which applies as well to Congress as it does to the State legislatures.

Mr. GEORGE. But there is no mention in the two cases cited of the prohibition in State constitutions against the impairment of contracts?

Mr. REED. No. My recollection is that neither of those cases does so.

Now, Mr. President, I pass to the third ground on which I think this proposed legislation is clearly in violation of the Constitution. I refer to the power which the bill pretends to give to the Secretary of Agriculture to license or refuse to license the processors of agricultural products. As recently as last year it has been held by the Supreme Court in the case of New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann (285 U.S. 262), a case decided March 21, 1932, that it was not within the power of the Legislature of Oklahoma to declare the business of manufacturing ice to be affected with a public use; that it was not affected with a public interest in the sense that a railroad is, and therefore was not subject to regulation or license by the authorities of that State. The Court said in part:

> It may be quite true that in Oklahoma ice is not only an article of prime necessity but indispensable; but certainly not more so than food or clothing or the shelter of a home. And this Court has definitely said that the production or sale of food or clothing cannot be subjected to legislative regulation on the basis of a public use.

I hope Senators heard that last sentence, which was uttered by the Supreme Court only last year. I repeat it:

> This Court has definitely said that the production or sale of food or clothing cannot be subjected to legislative regulation on the basis of a public use.

Yet, with that statement ringing in our ears, we are proposing to pass a bill here which will give to a single Cabinet officer, without appeal, the right to forbid the manufacture of clothing or the manufacture of food, to regulate their sale and their production, and even to forbid their production. We might as well toss our law books out of the window; there never is any use in printing a decision of the Supreme Court if opinions so solemnly rendered as that are going to be ignored within 12 or 15 months after they were rendered by the very Court that rendered them.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. What was the vote in deciding that case?

Mr. REED. Does the Senator refer to the Ice Co. case?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. REED. My recollection is that the vote was 6 to 2. Mr. Justice Cardozo did not participate in the decision, and Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Stone dissented. Six justices concurred in the majority opinion.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator understand that this bill is drawn or is sought to be rested upon the theory that was declared to be unsound in that case?

Mr. REED. Precisely.

Mr. BLACK. I do not so understand.

Mr. REED. This bill undertakes to regulate the production and sale of food and clothing, a matter which in the case decided last year, the Ice Co. case, the Supreme Court said was beyond the legislative power.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, the Senator understands that the phrase "subject to a public use" involves a great deal of confusion. The Senator may have read an article recently published in the Harvard Law Review as to the uncertainty of that phrase. I do not understand that this bill was sought to be rested upon that theory which does appear in a number of cases as being touched by a public interest.

Mr. REED. It is difficult to say how the regulation established here could be valid unless the industry which it is proposed to regulate was touched by a public interest.

Mr. President, there are many interesting cases in which the Supreme Court has discussed that question; indeed, even in the Ice Co. case, from which I have just read, the Supreme Court said as part of the same opinion, speaking of the ice business:

> It is a business as essentially private in its nature as the business of the grocer, the dairyman—

And the business of the dairyman is one of those that we are undertaking to regulate by this bill—

> the butcher—

Another business to be regulated by this bill—

> the baker—

> the shoemaker, or the tailor, each of whom performs a service which, to a greater or less extent, the community is dependent upon and is interested in having maintained, but which bears no such relation to the public as to warrant its inclusion in the category of businesses charged with a public use.

Clearly, if that opinion stands this bill cannot stand.

Mr. President, I have stated three reasons why I think this bill is clearly unconstitutional. A fourth one occurs in the delegation of the taxing power to the Secretary of Agriculture. It is only right that all of us and the country, too, should realize the breadth of the power that is attempted to be delegated by this bill. It gives to the Secretary of Agriculture, in his uncontrolled discretion, the right to say upon what products a sales tax shall be imposed, and it gives to him the uncontrolled discretion to fix the amount of that sales tax anywhere from zero to infinity. There is no limitation on the amount of the tax he may impose; and there is no limitation upon the categories of articles upon which he may impose it, because, not only by the earlier sections is he given the power to tax the basic agricultural products which are named, but in a subsequent section, shortly thereafter, there is given him power to find that any other commodity is competitive with the basic commodities and upon such competitive commodity he may levy a sales tax as well.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. May I ask the Senator how he interprets the instructions to maintain parity, and whether that could be interpreted as involving discretion to fix a tax between zero to infinity?

Mr. REED. I think so.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not see how parity can be maintained if the Secretary of Agriculture has that latitude.

Mr. REED. It is because the latitude is so broad and because the Secretary is not instructed to fix a tax at the exact amount, for after he has first fixed it, regardless of the 1914 pre-war period of which the Senator speaks, if he finds the tax is interfering with the general sale of the commodity that is taxed he has authority to cut it in half or reduce it as far as the discretion indicates. So if it be said that the 1914 level fixes a rule which he is to apply, the subsequent section destroys the rule and gives him the right to fix the tax up or down within that level, according to his discretion, and not as dictated by the needs of the Government, not as dictated by the interest of the taxing power; not at all; but as he finds may be necessary to maintain the flow of commerce in those articles for the benefit of the producers.

To call that a rule of taxation is simply to misuse the word "rule." A rule is something that is fixed. "Regular" is the adjective that we get from the old Latin word that means "rule." It must be something regular; and yet this is irregular, according to the capricious discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

But that is not the worst of it, Mr. President. The Secretary is not to impose all these taxes at once. He is not to impose them all on a particular date. He is to levy these taxes when he thinks best and take them off when he thinks best. That is the way we delegate taxing power to this gentleman; and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], in his eloquent address in favor of this bill—I think it was he—stated that he expected that this taxing power would not be exercised all at once, but that the Secretary would start gently, so to speak. He is not going to kill his lobster by dropping it in hot water; he is going to bring it slowly to a boil! That is the way this act is to be administered.

Think of the discretion we are attempting to delegate by such an act as that! The amount of tax, the articles to be taxed, the time when they are to be taxed, and the time when they are to cease to be taxed are all left to the discretion of a Cabinet officer, without appeal to anybody, and without any more of a rule than the pious wish with which the bill begins, that we will put the farmer on the same happy basis that he was on in 1909–14.

Why, if that is a rule which justifies our delegation of the taxing power, Mr. President, we could pass an act giving the President the power to impose such taxes on such articles at such times as he needed in order to pay the current expenses of the Government; and, having done that, we could adjourn and go home, like the German Reichstag, for the next 4 years.

The rule I suggest, that the taxes should amount to enough to pay the Government's expenses, is just as much of a rule as the vague wish with which this bill begins. If this is valid, that would be valid; and if that is valid, the purse strings are permanently cut, and Congress might just as well go home.

Finally, a fifth reason why the bill is unconstitutional lies in part 3 of title I of the bill, the committee amendment which an hour or so ago we voted into the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Permit me to say that I cannot say whether or not I am in concurrence with the deductions drawn by the Senator, as I have been occupied a moment outside of the Chamber and came in just in time to hear the Senator advert to the suggestion of what was a rule touching the law.

Perhaps the Senator might forgive me if I revive him back to his student days and recall that in the first chapter of Chitty we had to learn the definition that the law is a rule of action, and so forth; and then, proceeding, that it is a rule because it must be something that is uniform, permanent, and universal. It is not, and could not be, an order, "Thou shalt not steal."

I thought possibly I might recall to the Senator the definition of the real meaning of a rule which doubtless was in his mind at the time he began the study in which he has so splendidly amplified his abilities as a great lawyer.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. The lack of regularity in a law which leaves to an administrative official the selection of the subjects of the tax, the time of the incidence of the tax, and the rate of the tax is so evident that I do not think I need to dwell upon it any longer.

Coming now to part 3, which we find beginning on page 25 of the bill, I must confess that I approach its study with a good deal of sympathy, because I had just been visited by a delegation of Pennsylvania farmers who had been persuaded by Mr. Simpson that that was the promised land, and that therein lay their salvation, and I told them then that I would study it with the earnest hope that I would be able to agree to it. But, Mr. President, when I found that it made a penitentiary offense the purchase of a single quart of milk by a mother from her next-door neighbor—not across a State line, but across the fence—she could not buy a quart of milk for that hungry baby without having first determined what the Secretary of Agriculture had pronounced to be a fair price for milk, the cost of production, and if she paid for that quart of milk 1 cent less than that proclaimed cost of production to the penitentiary she would go——

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator understands that the provision is out now, does he not?

Mr. REED. I understand that this morning the penitentiary part was stricken out, and that the mother is only to pay a fine of $1,000, for which the Secretary of Agriculture will sue her. That is the way the bill now stands, and if she buys another quart of milk the next day that is another offense, and the words that were added to the amendment make her liable for another $1,000.

Mr. WHEELER. My understanding was that an amendment was added this morning also by which that provision would apply only to dealers. I understood that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL] offered that amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. REED. If that was adopted, that is much better.

Mr. WHEELER. That is my understanding of the matter.

Mr. REED. I am glad to hear it. I did not know it. I am criticizing the bill in the form in which the committee reported it.

Mr. President, the only purchaser who is punished, I am told by my colleagues, is the dealer who happens to purchase. That is, a private citizen can commit this offense without being punished, but a dealer cannot. Perhaps that is "the equal protection of the laws" and perhaps it is not, but we will pass that over.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I think that provision of the law applying to dealers would not vary very much from the provisions of the other sections of the law.

Mr. REED. No; it is in harmony with the rest of the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I am sure the Senator does not see anything more unconstitutional about this provision than about the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. REED. Yes; I am just coming to it. I have stated four reasons why the whole business is unconstitutional, but there is a fifth reason why this is particularly so.

The only power we have in Congress to attempt to do the fantastic thing that is attempted by this bill is the power to regulate interstate commerce; but part 3 of title I has forgotten even that. It applies to one farmer over here in Arlington County, Va., who sells to his next-door neighbor, who happens to be a dealer in milk or hogs or whatnot. It does not even limit its application to interstate commerce, but it pretends to apply to every transaction by which any farmer or any owner, for that matter, of an agricultural product sells his article either in intrastate or interstate commerce to a dealer. Could anything be a more preposterous stretching of the powers that were delegated to Congress by the States of the Union when they met in the Constitutional Convention in 1787?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania if it is not still more preposterous that this bill should frankly and expressly violate clause 5 of section 9 of article I of the Constitution, prohibiting the imposition by Congress of any tax or duty upon articles exported from any State? I call the Senator's attention to the two sections on pages 22 and 23, expressly headed "Exportations", and which seemingly make it necessary for a man to give his bond for fidelity to the terms of this bill in order to exempt him from paying this tax if he is about to export his product.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator, because that is a sixth ground, which I had not thought to add to the list which I gave. Clearly, this is a tax upon exportations from a State, because the second part of title I of the bill relates only to agricultural products intended for exportation from one State into another.

I have finished, Mr. President. If the party lash can pass this bill, there is not much use in speaking in the Senate.

During the delivery of Mr. REED's speech,

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Let us have order.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in that connection I ask that the occupants of the galleries be considerate, as their voices descend into the Chamber and greatly disturb the speaker in the expression of his own thoughts and in having his colleagues hear what he has to say.

Mr. WALSH. Some of the disorder is right in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The admonition of the Chair is to those in the galleries just the same as it is to those on the floor of the Senate. The occupants of the galleries are here by the courtesy of the Senate, and they are expected to conduct themselves in such a way that the proceedings of the Senate will not be interfered with in any manner whatsoever.

After the conclusion of Mr. REED's speech,

Mr. CONNALLY obtained the floor.

PAYMENT OF PAGES

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me, since I have to leave the Chamber, to call up House Joint Resolution 152, providing for the payment of pages of the Senate and of the House of Representatives for the balance of the session, in order to move to concur in the joint resolution?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The joint resolution (H.J.Res. 152) to provide for the payment of pages for the Senate and House of Representatives for the first session of the Seventy-third Congress was read the first time by title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pages from April 1, 1933, until the end of the first session of the Seventy-third Congress, as follows:

For 21 pages for the Senate Chamber at the rate of pay provided by law, so much as may be necessary.

For 41 pages for the House of Representatives, including 10 pages for duty at the entrance to the Hall of the House, at the rate of pay provided by law, so much as may be necessary.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I send to the desk, and ask to have printed and lie on the table, two amendments to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], in concluding his very interesting and able address, made some reference to the use of the party lash in whipping this bill through.

It is quite amusing to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania talk about someone using the party lash, when up to the 4th day of last March the Senator from Pennsylvania was one of the chief wielders of the late-lamented party lash which now has been removed, I hope permanently, from the woodshed and will not be used at least during the next 4 years.

Think of the Senator from Pennsylvania talking about "the party lash", when we know that during the last administration, whenever the White House would cough the chest of the Senator from Pennsylvania would go through a violent convulsion, and when every act of the administration was sponsored here on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Pennsylvania, probably with the exception of the farm bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do.

Mr. REED. As I recall, one of the things that made me feel so extremely friendly to the Senator from Texas was the fine way in which he stood back of me when I was fighting for President Hoover on the immigration bill right after he took office. Does not the Senator remember that?

Mr. CONNALLY. That was just after he took office. He did not stay that way more than a short time.

Mr. REED. That was not any "party lash", was it?

Mr. CONNALLY. No.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator remember how he and I fought together for a tariff on oil, much to the displeasure of President Hoover?

Mr. CONNALLY. I remember how the Senator from Texas got the very reluctant assistance of the Senator from Pennsylvania on an excise tax on oil.

Mr. REED. Reluctant? [Laughter.] Mr. President, that is not a very grateful recognition of the loyal assistance that I gave the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say that the Senator from Texas smiled when he said that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. I merely want to suggest that if the Senator from Pennsylvania gave his reluctant support to the tariff on oil, that is the only reluctance he showed during the whole consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas will say, in all kindness and fairness, that the Senator from Pennsylvania did support the excise tariff on oil; but that is not at all remarkable, because the Senator from Pennsylvania believes in a tariff, and his sense of equity and justice naturally impelled him, if he were going to protect everything else, to put a duty on oil; and he was consistent in that.

Mr. LEWIS. My interruption is not particularly worthy of the heavy debate in which the eminent Senator seems to be indulging. I was about to ask whether the eminent Senator from Pennsylvania supporting the tariff on oil, in conjunction with the Senator from Texas, was another evidence of the smooth proceeding under which both Senators succeeded in having that tariff on oil remain in the bill?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas will observe, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois about his contribution to the impending debate, that the Senator illuminates in rather colorful fashion any debate in which he sees fit to inject any remarks.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania began his opposition to this measure by contrasting the industrial workers of the country as against the farmers. He began his chief argument against the bill by the statement that if we raise the prices of agricultural commodities, we shall increase the cost of living of the industrial worker. Of course that is true, in a measure. But let me suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that, through the leadership of himself and others who have gone before him in erecting tariffs supposedly in behalf of the industrial workers, under the pretext that they were for the benefit of the industrial workers, but largely in behalf of the manufacturers and the owners of great corporate properties, the farmer has been placed in the condition from which we hope by this measure in some degree to extricate him.

Let me suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania today that, with the thousands and perhaps millions of unemployed industrial workers in his own State, if the purchasing power of the farmer were restored, even in a measurable fashion, if the farmer could receive even a slight increase in the price of his products over the price he is now receiving, thousands of those industrial workers might be restored to their employment, and might receive wages which they would earn, instead of walking the streets, and perhaps receiving doles from the Federal Treasury. The whole country knows that, the farmers know it, and we know it.

Mr. President, if the farmer's buying power could be increased at all, unemployment would be decreased, and the condition of the wage earners in this Republic would be improved; and the Senator from Pennsylvania ought to know that.

The Senator from Pennsylvania makes some criticism of President Roosevelt's statement that the pending bill is an experiment, and he seems to chide the President for having claimed in the campaign that he had a program along the line of agricultural relief, and that now he has modified that by admitting that this is an experimental program. It is to the credit of President Roosevelt that he frankly admits that this measure is experimental. We all know it is experimental. For myself, I do not know whether it will be an entire success or not. No one in this Chamber knows whether it will be an entire success. But President Roosevelt at least has offered a program. He is offering a plan, and he is entitled to have that plan have its place in the sun. He has a right to give it a chance, and this is the only plan which has been submitted. The committee has worked on it for weeks, and I submit that the administration has the right to have an opportunity to redeem its pledges.

I might remind the Senator from Pennsylvania that his administration undertook the relief of agriculture, we know with what disastrous results. Those of us on this side of the Chamber supported that administration's plan on final passage. We offered amendments. We undertook to place the debenture provision on that administration program. We failed, and then we supported the program. But today the Republican side of this Chamber has aided in engrafting on the pending bill part 3, which the administration does not desire, containing a grant of powers which the Secretary of Agriculture says he does not want conferred upon him. Yet the Senator from Pennsylvania denounces part 3 of the bill, when its incorporation in the bill was brought about in part by his side of the Chamber.

I am not challenging the sincerity of Senators on the other side, but I am asking the Senator from Pennsylvania to consult his own leader. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], for years the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, the Senator who reported the farm bill here under the last administration, voted to incorporate into the pending bill part 3, known as the "Simpson plan", when the Senator from Arkansas stated here on the floor that the administration did not desire that amendment, that it is not a part of the plan of the administration; yet, under the leadership of the Senator from Oregon, Senators on the other side are forcing into the bill something which the administration does not desire.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Pennsylvania criticizes President Roosevelt for his course with reference to this bill, it may be said that the President at least has a program. We have at last leadership in the White House. Instead of 4 years of drifting and shifting and indecision and inaction, we have at least action in the White House, and today one of the reasons why President Roosevelt has such an appeal to the people of the country is not so much because of the details of the measures which he is sponsoring, for the people do not know about the details, but it is because the people of the country feel that at least there is someone in the White House who has a program.

He may make mistakes; of course, he may make mistakes. The Senator from Pennsylvania avows that he himself has made mistakes. He avowed that he had voted for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill and that he has regretted that vote ever since. I am glad to know that at least the Senator from Pennsylvania and I agree on one subject. I voted against the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill and have been glad that I so voted ever since that bill passed this body.

We now have aggressive leadership in the White House. There may be mistakes made under this bill. The Secretary of Agriculture may probably make mistakes in administering the law. But at least the administration is seeking to redeem its platform pledges to the country, pledges which both parties made.

If I mistake not, the Senator from Pennsylvania was in the Republican National Convention last year. If he denies that, I shall be glad to accept his denial.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was a delegate, but I was kept here in the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. I knew that the Senator ought to have been a delegate. Let me read what the Republican Party platform promised. Both parties are guilty. Both parties have been telling the American farmer for 12 years that by some sort of legislative legerdemain we are going to do something for him. Both parties have been telling him that we are going to put him on an economic equality with industry. Both parties have been telling him that we were going to give him a chance to get a fair price for agricultural products. Both parties, Republican and Democratic, have been telling him that. I can understand the attitude of the Senator from Pennsylvania when I read the Republican platform of 1932. Speaking of agriculture, after telling about farm distress and all that kind of thing, which I will not read because of its length, the platform said:

> Almost the first official act of President Hoover was the calling of a special session of Congress to redeem these party pledges.

And then it concludes:

> They have been redeemed.

Of course, if the Senator from Pennsylvania feels that the old Farm Board, and that the actions of the last administration, have redeemed their pledges to agriculture and to the farmer, if those pledges have been redeemed, of course, the obligation is settled, the debt is acquitted; and, of course, the Senator from Pennsylvania is eminently correct in not doing anything more for the farmer.

Mr. President, I do not speak as one who has always spoken loudly on this floor in behalf of farm relief. I have not voted for all farm-relief measures offered here. In the old days of the McNary-Haugen bill I did not support that measure at any stage of the proceedings because I believed that it was impractical, and would be hurtful and harmful to the farmer, and that the exercise of the power conferred in that measure would harm him rather than benefit him. I voted for the farm bill under the Republican administration of Mr. Hoover, not because I approved of portions of the bill or all of the bill. There was little in it that I did approve. We sought to amend it by incorporating the debenture provision, which I did approve. But when we failed in that, I accepted the bill and voted for it, because both of the parties had been promising farm relief. I deferred to the wishes of the administration. I accepted the leadership of Mr. Hoover. I do not believe the Senator from Pennsylvania went along with him on the Farm Board bill, as I recall it.

Mr. REED. Yes; I did.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Pennsylvania went along with Mr. Hoover on that bill, and I was following humbly their leadership. They were carrying the flags and blowing the horns and I was coming along like a faithful private in the ranks.

If the Senator from Pennsylvania labors under the delusion that that law has solved all the farmer's troubles and that the Republican Party has paid its debt to the farmer, well and good; but I cannot agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Farm Board law has paid the debt. I believe that the farmer today is in just as dire extremity as he was, perhaps worse than when we passed the Farm Board Act.

I do not agree with all of the pending bill. There is much in the bill that I do not approve. We know that if the Senate undertook to frame a farm relief bill, and gave each Senator a chance to write a farm relief bill, instead of having 1 bill, we should probably have 40 bills. Probably every Senator has a different plan. Within the past year I have had submitted to me by correspondence I suppose a hundred different plans for farm relief. We cannot have more than one plan. We have to accommodate our views. We have to compromise our contentions. We cannot pass 40 farm relief bills. It is this bill or nothing.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has been working for weeks on this measure. Republicans and Democrats alike have agreed upon it. The leader on the other side of the Senate in agricultural matters, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], as I understand, voted to report the bill. It is a compromise measure, in a fashion.

After all, it is a plan of the administration. The administration has proposed this plan and frankly avowed that it is an experiment. The President has gone further and said that if it is a failure, he will be the first to admit that it is a failure and to cease operations under it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to.

Mr. REED. The Senator agrees, does he not, that very great power of regulation over commodity prices is given the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator see in the newspapers a day or two ago that a seat on the Chicago Board of Trade had just been purchased by the President's son-in-law, Mr. Dall?

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not see it. If the Senator says it was in the paper, I accept his statement.

Mr. REED. I have had information to that effect from 2 or 3 sources. I did not want to mention it unless the Senator could assure me that it is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. REED. If it is correct, that is a queer way to "drive the money changers out of the temple."

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Pennsylvania is not responsible for anything a son-in-law of the President does or any other individual except himself. I do not know anything about the newspaper report which the Senator says he saw. I accept the Senator's statement that it was in the paper. The President's son-in-law to me is no more than anybody else's son-in-law. If he violates the laws or the proprieties, he is subject to the condemnation of the Senator from Texas and all other men of like mind to the same extent as anybody else's son-in-law.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania complains about and is quarreling with the civil service law. Why should the Senator from Pennsylvania drag in a political issue like the civil service law in connection with the administration of the provisions of the pending bill? Does the Senator from Pennsylvania believe from a practical standpoint that he could go to the Civil Service Commission list of eligibles and find individuals in any large degree who were capable of administering the provisions of this bill? Of course, he could not. Of course, he knows he could not. If I were the Senator from Pennsylvania, one of the spokesmen of the late administration, I should never mention the civil service and its administration. Those of us on this side of the Chamber know that the administration of President Hoover with relation to the civil service was a farce.

What did they do in my State? When they wanted a man appointed rural carrier or postmaster, they advised the Civil Service, through the Post Office Department, as to what individual they wanted appointed, and that individual finally landed on the eligible list. If he could not make the grade on the first examination, they would order a new examination and give him a second trial. If he did not get on the list that time, they would keep on having new examinations until the particular individual they desired to appoint got a place on the eligible list. If I were the Senator from Pennsylvania, I would not speak about the administration of the civil service law when the recollection of the late administration's method of handling that law is so fresh in the minds of those of us who received such treatment by the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department in our areas of the country.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania says the bill is unconstitutional. It may be. I do not know what the Supreme Court is going to decide on the question. I do not believe anybody else knows. Frequently the court itself does not know. Usually the court divides on such questions. In some of the decisions which the Senator read and submitted to the Senate there were dissenting opinions. In the Oklahoma case, as I recall it, Mr. Justice Brandeis wrote a strong dissenting opinion.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania mistakes the basis upon which this bill has its foundation. It is not based upon the same powers that were discussed in the cases to which the Senator adverted. Most of those cases were State cases. Most of those cases involved questions of local control of prices and regulation. This bill is based upon the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution, the regulation of commerce between the States. Of course, if the Court does find that an effort has been made to reach articles not in interstate commerce, those powers will fall.

The Senator from Pennsylvania pointed out six grounds upon which he says the bill will be found unconstitutional. The Senator need not have worried about the last five grounds. If he can convince the Court of the first one, that is sufficient. There is no reason on earth why the Senator should have labored and toiled to get six reasons why the bill is unconstitutional. All he needs is one good reason that the court can understand.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is naturally interested in industrial workers in his State, and properly so. But, Mr. President, there is no enmity and there ought not to be any enmity between the industrial workers and the agricultural workers. Their welfare is all bound up together. If the farmers do not receive a fair return for their labor, the industrial workers will not secure the measure of employment that they would otherwise. Unless the industrial workers receive a living wage, the farmer will not receive an adequate market for his products. There is no reason for drawing any lines of contrast or enmity between these particular groups.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania must admit that every piece of tariff legislation that has been enacted in the United States for the past 50 years has been based on the plea that it was in behalf of American industrial labor, the man in the shop, the man in the factory. The tariff exactions on the farmer were extorted from him on the pretext that he must let labor in the factories get a larger wage, shorter working hours, better living conditions, at the expense of the American farmer. All of us know that the tariff bears more heavily upon agriculture than upon any other industry. All of us know that the tariff benefits for agriculture are infinitesimal. We know we cannot give to agriculture generally, except in a few of its branches, any substantial benefits by tariff legislation, particularly in the case of those commodities which are exportable. No tariff will aid agricultural commodities of which we produce an exportable surplus because the surplus which is sold abroad controls the price of the domestic market here at home. If it is fair for us to enact legislation for 75 years in behalf of the industrial workers, why can we not now at least make a genuine effort, a respectable effort, toward a program in behalf of agricultural labor?

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania is greatly exercised about the transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture of the taxing power. That question did not bother the Senator when he was voting for the flexible tariff provision.

We had a bill here, as Senators will remember, giving the President power to raise and lower tariffs, making them flexible, without the consent of Congress except as that consent was obtained in advance by the enactment of the law. The Senator from Pennsylvania made an able argument on the constitutionality of that law. It was fair for Congress to give the President power to raise the tariff if it would aid the industrial workers of Pennsylvania, but it is now unconstitutional to give any power to anybody to raise the prices of agricultural commodities.

I hope I am not unfair in that argument. I think Senators will recall the very extended, exhaustive, and able arguments of the Senator from Pennsylvania in behalf of the flexible tariff. If flexibility is good in the tariff, why should it not be good for those who have been paying the tariff burdens all these years?

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania says the bill will prevent exports, that it will prevent us from selling our goods in foreign markets. One of the troubles with agriculture has been the falling off of our foreign markets and our foreign trade. How the Senator from Pennsylvania can argue that this bill will hurt the exportation of those goods, when the purpose of the act is to raise the domestic price and thereby lower the foreign price, I cannot understand. He says it will be dumping and that foreign countries will enact antidumping laws. What about manufactured articles? It is frequently claimed that steel rails manufactured in Pennsylvania are sold for less abroad than in the United States. I do not know whether that is true today or not; but if it is true, it presents the same situation this bill would present. I know of no foreign government preventing the importation of American steel rails by prohibitive rates.

The Senator from Pennsylvania says we cannot tax one man and give the benefits to another. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] quite properly suggested to the Senator from Pennsylvania that that is exactly what the tariff has been doing all these years. It is taxing the farmer, it is taxing the consumer, and thereby indirectly conferring a benefit upon the manufacturer and upon the industrial worker. Of course, it is not exactly a parallel, but the same principle is involved.

The bill also carries a provision for refinancing farm mortgages. It seems to me that is perhaps the most admirable part of the measure. It may not be 100 percent perfect. It no doubt has deficiencies and defects in it, but it at least offers a program to the American farmer to save his home, to get reduced interest rates. In this period of depression and deflation if the farms are foreclosed and farmers lose their homesteads, we are then faced with the prospect of the United States becoming a country of land barons and peasants. That is the prospect. No government ought to look upon that prospect with indifference. It is a prospect that no free people can contemplate without grave concern. This bill does offer a plan for refinancing farm mortgages in order to extend and amortize loans at lower rates of interest and thereby give substantial relief to the farm owners of America.

Mr. President, in conclusion, let me say that I do not pretend to say that, were I writing the bill, I would write it as it is written. There is much in it to which I do not agree. There is much in it which I accept with doubt and with uncertainty. But, Mr. President, who has offered a better plan? Why does not the Senator from Pennsylvania, if he is concerned with agriculture, offer a better plan? Why does not the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], long the champion of farm legislation, bring into this Chamber something better? It is easy to criticize. It is easy for a shrewd lawyer with a keen mind like that of the Senator from Pennsylvania to go into his library in the quiet of the evening and pick constitutional flaws and technical defects in any piece of legislation. I dare say that the Senator from Pennsylvania can take any bill now on the Vice President's desk, and, given 24 hours in his study, would be able to come back and show the Senate, according to his own ideas and standards, that we could not by any possible means uphold the constitutionality of the particular bill. It is easy to criticize. It is difficult to construct.

Mr. President, this is the administration plan to redeem its platform pledges as to agriculture. It is the administration plan to meet its promises to the American people. It is the plan of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, composed of Republicans and Democrats alike. It is the plan of the President, who frankly admits it is an experiment and who states that if it is not a success he will be the first to admit it is a failure and frankly tell the American people and the Congress in order that we may adopt some other plan.

The President has a program; he has a plan. The country has faith in the President's leadership. Now is the time to go forward and give the President's plan a chance, an opportunity to demonstrate either its success or its failure.

I voted against section 3 of the bill, which is known as the Simpson amendment, because the President and the Secretary of Agriculture do not want that amendment; that it is not a part of their plan. They regard it as impracticable, and I regard it as impracticable. I do not believe that it is workable.

Mr. President, let us give this administration bill a chance. Let us give the farmer a chance; let us see whether or not the bill can accomplish the result that it offers to the American people; but let us not quibble and criticize. We can have only 1 plan; we cannot have 40 plans. This plan is offered; it has the backing of the administration and of this side of the Chamber, and I appeal to Members on the other side of the aisle to do as we did in voting for the Farm Board bill under Mr. Hoover. Let us give the present administration a chance to redeem its promises and to keep faith with the people of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Texas, I take it, invites the Senators on the other side of the Chamber to do as he did and vote for the pending farm relief bill and suffer the same fate?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina anticipates that this bill will be the failure that the Farm Board bill was. Perhaps it will be; I do not know. I voted for the Farm Board bill, however, hoping that it would do some good, trusting that it would do some good, and I submit now to the Senator from North Carolina that an honest effort to do something in any good cause is worth more than failure and negation and sitting still and undertaking to do nothing.

How are we to know with certainty as to anything that may happen? Mr. President, is not the field of invention, the field of science, and every pathway which the world has ever trod a field of experiment? We do not know until we try. Except for experiment it would not be known that the big mosquitoes that come in from the sea and breed along the marshes in North Carolina were transmitting yellow fever and by a bite would carry that deadly germ into the human body. Except for experiment, America, which has given us life and nourishment and an opportunity to live, would still be inhabited by the red man. Christopher Columbus did a little experimenting. He started out to find India; he did not know he was going to find America. How could he know it? He had a dream; he had a vision that over yonder somewhere were the East Indies, that the earth was round, and that by going westward he would arrive at the East Indies. He did not arrive in the East Indies. No; but he arrived in another Indies, in another land which, compared to the Indies, with 400 years added in advancement, is greater in riches, in resources, in the marvels of this day than any Indies of old.

Mr. President, of course this is an experiment. How did the scientist yonder in the laboratory learn the causes of diseases of the human body and ascertain how to cure them? How does the physician advance his science except by experiment?

If we try one plan for the farmers and, after a trial, they say it does not work, I shall not be sorry that I tried; I would be sorry if I had not tried. Failure, if it comes, will be failure in a good cause, I shall say to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CONNALLY. I retract the reference to the Senator. I know he is rising to suggest that he is from North Carolina instead of South Carolina. I retract and correct my statement. I intended to say "the Senator from North Carolina", and I am not going to make any reference to what the Governor of North Carolina said to the Governor of South Carolina. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Texas argues——

Mr. CONNALLY. No; the Senator from Texas does not argue; he just states his reasons.

Mr. BAILEY. All right; I will accept his characterization. The Senator states that it is a wise policy to expose the farmer not to one bite of the mosquitoes but to a thousand bites. I think the argument would be good if we should expose the Senators rather than the farmers to the bites.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator that I had rather be stung by a mosquito, as Walter Reed and some of his associates were, in order to try to solve the problem, even though I suffered some inconvenience and some discomfort, than simply to do nothing and not try to solve it. It is easy to vote against anything and everything, but it takes courage to try an experiment. If we try the experiment and it fails, of course the farmers will blame us; they will say, "You voted for a plan that did not work." But, Mr. President, I had rather try and fail than not try at all.

I know the Senator from North Carolina is entirely sincere and may fear this bill, if enacted, may not work. He may be correct; but unless we shall pass the bill we shall never know whether he was correct or not. However, if we do enact the measure and it is in any degree a success, blessed will be our action and improved will be the weal of the farmer.

Mr. President, I want to say frankly that I do not believe this bill will realize all the hopes that have been aroused in the farmer's breast. I am frank to say that I do not believe any bill looking toward farm relief will make every farmer prosperous and happy; that is impossible; it cannot be done; but if this bill does anything toward equalizing his economic condition with that of industry and with that of other lines of business in the United States, it will have made some progress; we shall have accomplished something; we shall not have simply been advocates of negation, inaction, indecision, doubt, and all kindred processes of do nothing.

I know there is an old saying, "When in doubt, do nothing." Well, Mr. President, a great many people are in doubt all the time, and if the doctrine "when in doubt, do nothing" is good, the world would still be back over yonder on the banks of the Nile with the Egyptians. It takes daring spirits, it takes enterprise; it takes those who are willing to take the risk of blame; it takes those who are willing to take the hazard of condemnation if their efforts fail to blaze new paths and to accomplish new things. Old Christopher Columbus, to whom I adverted a little while ago, when he got half way over to America, had a mutiny in his fleet; his sailors rose up and challenged his authority. What did Christopher Columbus do? Did he say, "I am afraid to go on; somebody may criticize me; I may not get to the Indies; I am afraid; I shall not go farther; I shall stop; I shall not do anything, and anyway, it may be unconstitutional to go over there, and I shall not go; I shall not try." But had he turned around and gone back to Spain, the forebears of the Senator from North Carolina might still be over in England or possibly in Ireland or some of the other European countries even until this day, and the Senator would not be bothered with questions in the American Senate, but would be sitting in the councils of the king.

Mr. President, I want to admit that this bill is an experiment; I want to admit that it will not give to the farmer all the things that he is hoping for; I want to admit that it may be in some aspect a failure; but it is at least an effort; it is action instead of inaction; it is a program instead of sitting still and doing nothing. It is a charted course, instead of the course of Mr. Hoover, of dillydallying, sidestepping issues, turning them over to commissions. We have leadership in the White House, and, as a Democrat and an American, I propose to follow the leadership of the President unless to do so is contrary to my own judgment and my own convictions.

We all know that all farm legislation is experimental. We had the McNary-Haugen bill, we had the debenture plan, we had the Farm Board, and now me have this measure. Suppose it fails. We shall admit its failure and take some other course, adopt some other program; but, Mr. President, we at least have here a program and a plan, and I, for one, representing a great agricultural State, propose to vote for the bill and give the administration's plan a chance and the administration itself an opportunity to redeem its pledges to the American people.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE FARMER

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the argument presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] against the enactment of this bill, in which he attacked it on the ground of the difficulty of its practical administration and on the ground of its constitutionality, and wherein he has assailed the very purpose of the measure itself. I have also listened with a great deal of admiration and entertainment to the very able argument made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] in refutation of that advanced by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have, too, listened with a great deal of interest to and have gained much information from the arguments which for the last 3 or 4 days have been presented in the Senate in connection with this bill. Those arguments, Mr. President, have convinced me that the impression I entertained at the time of the introduction of the bill, and have, in fact, entertained for some time, is correct—namely, that we have a very difficult problem with which to deal. Still, Mr. President, we have a problem, and that problem is confronting us today as it has been confronting us for some 12 years, and it has been growing more and more and more acute. It is inviting legislative attention and, if possible, legislative enactment successfully to deal with it and relieve the distressing situation which faces the agricultural industry of the United States.

As I listened to the debate of the very able and distinguished Senators upon this floor, I was driven inescapably to the conclusion that there cannot be enacted by the Congress of the United States any statute that would undertake, in detailed provisions, to regulate this industry and to solve this great problem. So complex is it, so infinite in its variety, dealing with different commodities, dealing with different sections of the country, dealing with the constant changes in the swiftly moving panorama of economic events passing before our view, that I have come to the conclusion that detailed regulations in respect to our agricultural industry that would be undertaken by statutory enactment today would be obsolete perhaps in a few months; that what would be practical and good and sound to incorporate in a statute now may later on prove to be ineffective; and that regulations that we would think today would be justified might, on experiment, prove to be faulty.

Therefore, I have come to the conclusion, Mr. President, that if we are going to undertake to deal with this problem, if we are going to undertake to provide the ways and means by which it is to be solved, we shall have to vest somewhere the authority to prescribe regulations looking toward the solution of this problem rather than to undertake ourselves to prescribe them by an enactment of Congress.

Mr. President, I am reenforced in that conclusion when I realize that for some 12 years—or perhaps not quite that long, but at least for a number of years—our national legislative body has had this problem up for consideration, and to date has failed to solve it.

You know, and we know, and the country knows, that various plans have been proposed in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States, and they have never fructified into legislation.

There was presented the equalization-fee plan, which passed both Houses and which met its death under a Presidential veto.

There was the export-debenture plan, which, according to my recollection, never survived the parturition pains of forensic discussion.

The domestic-allotment plan, which in the House, where I was last session, was incorporated into a bill and with enthusiasm sent to this Chamber for enactment, never became law.

According to my understanding, the only major measure or plan that has been enacted into law by the Congress of the United States dealing with farm relief has been the creation of the Federal Farm Board; and when a few days ago an Executive order destroyed the existence of that Board that order was received with cheers in the House of Representatives and with dignified satisfaction in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, what are we going to do about this problem?

Every Senator who has taken the floor and discussed this bill has recognized the existence of the problem. They have recognized the acuteness of it. They have recognized the complexity of it. They have recognized the long duration of it. They have recognized the growing seriousness of it. Under an administration called into being by an overwhelming vote of the United States to bring about farm relief among other relief measures, shall we, the representatives of the people, go back to our farmer friends and say that under the request and at the behest of the man who was placed in power to preside over the destinies of this Nation to do something to bring about farm relief after Congress had failed for some 12 years successfully to cope with this problem, once more we have failed, that we are unable to solve the problem, that it is beyond the power and the ability and the comprehension of the Senate of the United States of America? No, Mr. President, I do not think we can afford to do that.

For my part, it appears to me that there is only one course that I can pursue. We may all differ, and we do differ, as to what is the best plan of farm relief to be adopted; and if we unite on any one particular plan, we differ as to the details of that plan; but there is one fact that stands out boldly in the recent political history of this country.

When Mr. Roosevelt accepted the nomination of the Democratic Party, he did so upon a platform which declared—and I quote in part from it—

> We favor the restoration of agriculture, the Nation's basic industry; better financing of farm mortgages through recognized farm bank agencies at low rates of interest on an amortization plan, giving preference to credits for the redemption of farms and homes sold under foreclosure; * * * effective control of crop surpluses so that our farmers may have the full benefit of the domestic market.
> The enactment of every constitutional measure that will aid the farmers to receive for their basic farm commodities prices in excess of cost.

Mr. Roosevelt ran upon that platform. He was elected President of the United States with that issue as one of the major issues of the campaign—failure on the part of Republican administration after Republican administration to bring about any farm relief—and he was sent into the power of the White House under the mandate and under the commission of an overwhelming majority of the American people to effect that which previous administrations had failed to do.

Acting under that mandate, commissioned as it were by the American people, he has sent to Congress this bill and has asked that it be enacted into law. It has passed the House of Representatives. It has been reported favorably by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It has been debated here for a number of days. There is no one who, either in a separate bill or in debate, has suggested a better plan for us to adopt to carry out the pledges that were made by this administration and by the great majority of the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives in reference to this program of farm relief.

Mr. President, I know that the Senate is jealous of its powers and its prerogatives. I know that unwillingly and reluctantly it will surrender those powers and prerogatives to any executive or to any other agency. But, Mr. President, we are confronted not so much with a theory; we are confronted with a fact, and we are confronted with a situation which cries out for something to be done. I feel that although this bill does vest drastic and extraordinary powers in the Secretary of Agriculture and in the executive officers who are going to administer it, yet it is a bill that, in consonance with the platform of the Democratic Party, is in harmony, I am sure, with what the Republican Party itself desires; and I am going to support the bill.

Mr. President, I think there should be placed in the RECORD a few statistics showing the details of the great problem which confronts us.

I take this information from the Crop Reporting Board of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture.

According to these figures, the March 1933 farm prices for cotton were 6.1 cents per pound as against 12.4 cents per pound during the 5-year pre-war period, being the basic period of the proposed act.

Wheat is selling at 34½ cents per bushel as against 88.4 cents per bushel during the pre-war period.

Corn is selling for 20.6 cents per bushel as against 64.2 cents per bushel during the pre-war period.

Hogs are selling at 3.22 cents per pound as against 7.24 cents per pound during the pre-war period.

Cattle are selling at 3.42 cents per pound as against 5.2 cents per pound during the pre-war period.

Cotton today is selling for 49 percent of the prices of the pre-war period, corn 32 percent, wheat 39 percent, and hogs 44 percent.

The prices that are being paid by the farmer today for the commodities that he purchases are 3½ percent higher than the prices of the basic pre-war period referred to in this act. The prices received by the farmer are 50 percent lower than those of the pre-war period.

Mr. President, in the year 1919 the gross farm income, including income from crops and income from livestock and livestock products, was $16,935,000,000.

In 1929 it had gone down to $11,937,010,000.

In 1930, one year later, it had gone down still further to $9,396,039,000.

One year later, in 1931, this gross farm income had shrunk to $6,945,201,000.

It is estimated that in 1932 the gross farm income was approximately only $5,240,000,000.

Farm income has dropped from 22 percent of our national wealth, in 1920, to 7 percent, in 1932.

Mr. President, what about farm mortgages? In 1910 the farm-mortgage debt was $3,320,000,000. In 1928 the farm-mortgage debt had trebled and was $9,468,000,000. I am advised that it has decreased in 1933 to some $8,500,000,000. But it has not decreased by reason of any retirement of the principal. It has decreased by reason of the liquidation of farm-mortgage debts through foreclosures.

This increase of the farm-mortgage debt, so alarming even in its bare narration, has not been the result of improvements on the farms; it has not been the result of extension of agricultural activities, but it has been the result of the gradual accumulation of operative losses in the conduct of farming operations.

Mr. President, couple these statistics with the fact that 6½ million families, or 22½ percent of our population, actually live on our farms, and that 50 million of our people, all told, are dependent on agriculture, and then look upon the other side of the picture. While the prices of farm commodities have been going down and down, as the price levels of farm commodities have been receding on a downward scale from the price levels of the things he has to buy, yet the fixed costs and the fixed charges which operate against the farmer have continued in unabated fury, and at times with increased fury.

State, local, and Federal taxes have not gone down during this period of grief to the farmer, covering some 13 years. They have doubled and trebled. Freight rates, telegraph, telephone, electric, and water rates have not gone down. The interest charges still remain high, and the amortized payments on the principal of the debts are still to be met. Have the costs of farming implements and machinery gone down? Has there been a drop in the prices of the things with which the farmer conducts his operations, the tools and implements of his industry? No; they have increased by some 53 percent over what they were during the pre-war period.

Mr. President, I look beyond the debate going on in this Chamber. I look beyond this scene, where the distinguished legislators in this body talk about the practical workings and the administration of the bill under consideration, about its constitutionality; about what would happen if some farmer were to go to his community store and undertake to exchange a few bushels of wheat for a pair of socks or a pair of shoes; about the processing of the shoat of some sow into pork by some farmer with a view of disposing of that product, and urge various objections to the actual workings and operations of the plans proposed by this bill. I say I look beyond this Chamber. I look down to our southern fields and our western plains, and I lose sight of the captious objections urged here to this measure, and I see mounting higher and higher the accumulation year by year of the great surplus of millions of bales of cotton and millions of bushels of wheat.

Mr. President, what I see today is the farmer standing out yonder in his field. He is going about his accustomed, his ancient, his primordial task of providing the clothing and the food for the teeming millions of this great country. He is not idling, he is not in the bread lines, he is not walking the streets of our cities looking for employment or asking for alms. I make no criticism of those poor industrial laborers who are driven to that extremity, but the fact remains that the farmer is going about his work of producing the food and the clothing for this great country of ours. He is awaiting a solution of his great problem. "Still bowed with the weight of centuries", he leans today upon his hoe, looks with expectant hope to his Nation's Capital, while yet "upon his back rests the burden of the world."

I see another figure, Mr. President. I look from those fields in our rural districts; I look beyond this Senate Chamber and I see another figure at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, his face lit with the kindly grace of Abraham Lincoln, yet strong with the stern resolution of our martyred President. For my part I propose, when the roll is called on this bill, to vote for the farmer and for our President.

Mr. HASTINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I tender an amendment to be offered subsequently to the bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point an article containing an interview given by my colleague the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], appearing in the Providence Bulletin, regarding the bill now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Providence (R.I.) Bulletin]

Following a study of the probable effect of the proposed farm relief bill on his State, Senator JESSE H. METCALF today declared that the super sales tax proposed in the bill would cost the people of Rhode Island 75 times as much as could be reaped in benefit by Rhode Island farmers.

"The bill would cost Rhode Island consumers an estimated $7,500,000 per year in the form of taxes on the necessities of life", said the Senator. "At the same time, the Rhode Island farmers could not possibly benefit to an extent greater than $282,000, while paying a tax themselves of $181,000. Thus the people of Rhode Island would be paying $7,500,000 in taxes in order that Rhode Island farmers might benefit by $100,000."

"Such a proposal is obviously a rank discrimination against my State", said Senator METCALF, "and I shall most certainly oppose any measure which would result in such unfair taxation."

"The gross value of agricultural products of Rhode Island is something in excess of $10,000,000. I cannot see how the farmers of the State can be benefited by an increased value of less than 1 percent, especially when the purchasing power of Rhode Island consumers is decreased by 75 times that much."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I think it is rather surprising that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who addressed the Senate a few moments ago, should have blamed the Republicans of the Senate for the first defeat of the Democratic administration in the Senate. I have before me that particular vote. The Senator complains that the administration did not want the cost-of-production amendment which was adopted this afternoon and that the Republicans were responsible for its adoption. I desire to call attention to the fact that the record shows there were 28 Democrats voting for the amendment and 27 Democrats voting against it, while 18 Republicans voted for it and 14 Republicans voted against it. I think if there be any particular blame to be attached to anyone, the Senator from Texas owes an apology to somebody because of the remark he made with respect to that particular amendment. However, in view of the fact that I shall have some other things to say about what the Senator from Texas has said, I shall not ask him to reply immediately.

Mr. President, it is true I am not a member of the committee that has passed upon this bill and I have not given as much study to it as many other Senators have given. One does not have to give much study to it, however, to realize its very great importance and the tremendous effect that it may have upon the country.

The President in recommending the bill to the Congress stated frankly that it was an experiment, and further stated that if it did not work well he would be the first to admit it and be ready to abandon it. I assume the bill is to be passed substantially as it was reported by the committee and I sincerely hope that it may accomplish the purposes intended by those who conceived and framed it.

About one fourth of the population of the Nation are living on the farms and depending on the products of the farm for a livelihood. The total products for the farm for the year 1931 were $6,955,000,000. The bill places the whole of that population and the whole of this huge business, approximating $7,000,000,000 annually, in the hands of a single individual, the Secretary of Agriculture.

I do not overlook the fact, as pointed out by the sponsors of the bill, that nothing in the bill undertakes to force any farmer to come within its terms. Our attention has been called to the fact that the agreements that are to be made between the farmer and the Secretary of Agriculture are voluntary agreements and any farmer that disagrees with the proposal of the Government need not accept any proposed contract or any other benefits of this act.

Mr. President, while this is technically true, it is no answer at all to the charge that every farmer in the land is placed under the control of the Government and a single administrative officer of the Government. The bill creates one of the most gigantic trusts that ever was conceived. No such thing as this has ever before been proposed in a land where the people were free and could make their own rules and regulations to govern and control themselves.

No farmer and no group of farmers dare to refuse to come within the terms of the bill and put himself under the control of the Government. The very essentials and necessaries of life of the whole Nation are bound tightly within the four corners of this legislation. There are no checks and balances for the production of any individual under its terms. The whole Nation shall hereafter be dependent upon the good sense and fairness of a single individual. There are no appeals from his decisions, no relief from an arbitrary finding of facts; no way to get rid of an unfair regulation. Full power is given to shift farm prices back and forth as rapidly as the days come and go. No stability in prices is left anywhere.

Crop reports will be of no service in the future. They will not be a guide to persons dealing in these commodities after the passage of this act. Those persons who desire to make a budget for the purchase of farm commodities in the future can no longer speculate upon the weather, but they will be compelled to speculate upon the mind of a single individual and, in my judgment, the frailties of the mind of man are entirely too weak for such responsibilities.

Mr. President, it is contended by the Secretary of Agriculture that if he is to properly carry out the purposes of the bill it becomes necessary for the Congress to give him the very extraordinary powers about which I am complaining. I am not at all certain that that is not in the main true. It seems to me, however, that in considering legislation there are two important things to be considered. If it be believed by the Congress that the object of the legislation is a worthy one, the next question that arises is whether it can be so framed that it can be successfully administered. We sometimes conceive of legislation that we believe would be helpful to the people of the Nation, but when we come to prepare the necessary act involving its administration, we find the thing wholly impracticable. To my mind, this bill ought to be considered from that viewpoint. In other words, it seems to me that if we admit that this bill would benefit the whole people of the Nation, but are at the same time compelled to admit that it could not be administered except by giving this tremendous power to a single individual, I should feel justified in opposing it. I can think of no condition, unless it be the threatened invasion by the country of a foreign foe, that would justify the American Congress in turning over to a single individual the power to tax the consumers of the Nation for the benefit of the producers of farm products. I can think of hardly any emergency that would justify putting in the hands of one man the power to license or refuse license to the various processors of farm products. I can think of nothing more shocking than giving to such an individual the right to prohibit or control the kind of a contract that a producer proposes to make with a processor.

Mr. President, the farther away we get from the human element in the administration of any law the safer that law becomes, and the more nearly uniform its administration becomes. Certainly this bill has enough of that element in it to cause alarm, and I say this without any disrespect or reflection upon those who may be called upon to administer it.

Let us see what the Secretary of Agriculture says with respect to certain portions of the bill. It appears in the RECORD at page 1551. I quote:

> It would be possible for a Secretary of Agriculture equipped with one set of prejudices to do a grave injustice in this part of the bill to the farmers, whereas another Secretary of Agriculture, with a different set of prejudices, might do a grave injustice to the consumers.

No one will contend that it is possible to administer the bill without prejudices and without making very serious mistakes. No one will contend that it is possible with the great army of employees that will be necessary to enforce it that fraud and favoritism can possibly be avoided.

In this connection I call attention to paragraph (e) of section 10, which reads as follows:

> The action of any officer, employee, or agent in determining the amount of and in making any rental or benefit payment shall not be subject to review by any officer of the Government other than the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Treasury.

It will be observed that in the bill we have entirely abandoned the one thing of which the Government has always boasted, its accounting department. Employees of the Government everywhere, however small the amounts of Government funds that pass through their hands, have always been subject to the careful scrutiny of the auditing department of the Government. This bill not only abandons that but there is no provision in it anywhere providing for a system of auditing of any kind. It is assumed, I suppose, that this will be done by regulation, but, so far as Congress is concerned, it is leaving that entirely to an administrative officer of the Government.

There are 3,072 counties in the country. It will be necessary for employees of the Government under the bill to be spread over all of those counties. How many it would take I do not know. Mr. John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers Union, in his testimony, estimated that it would take 200,000 people to administer the provisions of the bill and at the same time he placed the cost at $600,000,000. I certainly hope his estimate of the number of people and the cost is greatly exaggerated.

It must be remembered, however, that the processing plants which would need supervision are many thousands, and I do not see how it is possible for any person to approximate the number of people that may be required to administer the bill.

But, Mr. President, there is another matter to which I desire to direct the attention of the Senate. The bill at the very outset makes a declaration of an emergency, refers to the disparity between the prices of agricultural and other commodities, "which disparity has largely destroyed the purchasing power of farmers for industrial products."

In the declaration of policy contained in section 2 the following language is used:

> To establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period.

In paragraph C of section 9 it is stated that—

> The fair exchange value of a commodity shall be the price therefor that will give the commodity the same purchasing power, with respect to articles farmers buy, as such commodity had during the base period.

From the language which I have quoted it would appear that the object of this portion of the bill is to increase the purchasing power of the farmer for industrial products, to give the agricultural commodities a purchasing power with respect to articles that farmers buy equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period. As I understand this portion of the bill, it is based upon the theory that an inequality exists because that which the farmer sells today has a price index of about 50, while that which he buys at the present time has an index price of about 104.

The distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who discussed this bill so thoroughly, made reference several times in his speech to this condition, stating that—

> Either industrial prices must be brought down or farm prices must be raised. By some means they must be brought closer to parity.

And again he said:

> For the sake of our economic health we must restore that parity between the prices of the things the farmer sells and the prices of the things he buys.
> To call this choice of a base period arbitrary, or to go a step further—

> and call the commodity price index meaningless, as some have, is to betray a singular ignorance of the relations between agriculture and industry throughout the years. To anyone who appreciates these relationships the commodity price index is full of meaning. It indicates now that while the farmer continues to labor and produce the buying power of his products has dropped to an undeniably low level in terms of the commodities for which he ordinarily exchanges his products.

I do not propose, Mr. President, to enter into any controversy about the desirability of increasing the price of farm commodities; it would undoubtedly add to the prosperity of the Nation, but I do think it is important to make it perfectly clear that this drastic legislation is founded upon the theory that that which the farmer buys has greatly increased in cost while that which he produces has greatly decreased in value.

This bill is based upon the false presumption that the farmer expends all of his income for industrial products. The language of the bill itself, as well as the language of those who are supporting and advocating it, is apparently all based upon this presumption.

I realize that statistics relating to the farmer's income and his expenses are depressing things to consider. The figures I shall quote clearly indicate that the farmer is in distress, but it is important that in our effort to assist him we should not base the legislation upon false theories.

A survey by the Department of Agriculture over a period of years, covering 7,437 farms, located in all parts of the United States, gives the average receipts for the year 1931 for each farm as $1,549. The same survey shows that $1,287 of that income was expended by the farmer in the operation of the farm in the following manner:

Livestock bought	102
Taxes	183
Interest	196
Feed	184
Fertilizer	55
Seed	34
Machinery and tools	62
Miscellaneous items	167

It seems to me that it is of some importance to call attention to the fact that industrial products constituted but a small portion of this expense. Certainly there must be eliminated hired labor, taxes, and interest. I think feed ought also to be excluded, because the cost of feed is so directly connected with the price of the farm products. And certainly livestock bought ought to be eliminated. I assume that seed is also a farm product and might be eliminated, although I suppose it is true that those who make a specialty of producing seed may not always be classed as farmers. But if we eliminate the items I have mentioned we have left fertilizer, machinery and tools, and the miscellaneous items, the total of which amounts to $284. It will thus appear that only 11.8 percent of that which is used by the farmer in the operation of his farm can be classed as industrial products. And yet we stand here today insisting to the country that it is necessary to increase the price of the farmer's products so that he may have an opportunity to buy industrial products and thus increase their value.

According to the Agricultural Yearbook for 1932, on page 907, the 1930 census shows 30,157,000, or 24.6 percent of the people of the Nation, living on the farms. The total population is 122,775,000, and if we deduct the number living on the farm, we have left 92,628,000, who will be compelled to bear the burden of the cost of this proposed legislation.

The Secretary of Agriculture estimates that it will increase the cost to the consumer $800,000,000. Others have estimated that it will certainly cost a billion dollars and perhaps much more than that.

If we assume that the 92 million people who do not live on the farm will have to bear this tax, and we estimate the tax at $15 per person, we get a total cost to the consumer of $1,380,000,000. As nearly as I have been able to make the computation, the cost will be at least that much. Thus it means a tax on every family of five in the United States of $75 annually.

If it be desired to speculate a little, it seems to me that the unemployed and their families probably represent at least one third of the people of the country who do not live on the farm. If that be true, and it be assumed, as it must be assumed, that such unemployed cannot bear the burden of this increased price, the burden is immediately shifted to the other two thirds and their per capita tax of $15 is increased to $22.50 per person, or from $75 per family of five to $112.50.

I am wondering how anybody can justify any such performance as this. We have heard some complaint on the floor of the Senate about taking some $500,000,000 from the soldiers and Government employees. We have undertaken to justify that because of the condition of the Federal Treasury.

Our attention has been called to the fact that immediately after doing that we appropriated some $250,000,000 to pay the men working in the national forests and we donated $500,000,000 to the States to assist them in caring for the unemployed, and it has been undertaken to justify these acts upon the ground that they were necessary in order to enable many people to live. But what justification can there be for taxing three fourths of the people, at least one third of whom are now living on charity, the sum of $10 or $15 per person annually in order to put farm products on a parity with industrial products? All of this is to be done, it will be remembered, in order that farm products may be on a parity with industrial products, which constitute but 11.8 percent of the annual cost of operating a farm.

Mr. President, it is impossible for me to forget in this connection some of the arguments I have heard upon the floor of the Senate with respect to the principles of the Republican tariff advocated by the Republican Party. The Republicans have been charged in season and out of season with imposing a great tax burden upon the American people by reason of the high protective tariff which that party has advocated. Many Members of the Senate on the other side of the Chamber have time and again figured the entire tariff as a tax upon the American people. We have insisted that the tariff did not always increase the price of the article upon which it was laid, but that it merely protected it for the home industries and the wage earners in those industries. In addition to that, the tariff constitutes an important part of the revenue and thus helps to bear the expenses of the Federal Government. In view of this fact, is it not rather surprising to find the Democratic Party advocating an outright tax on the consumers of the Nation in order to benefit certain producers of the Nation? Of course, the answer to this suggestion is the same as it has always been, that the Republican protective tariff was enacted in behalf of the special and big interests of the Nation, while the tax proposed by the pending bill is for the benefit of an entirely different and a very worthy class. However much merit one may think there is in that answer, those who advocate this bill can never stand forth again as the champions of the consuming public. They can never again successfully argue that there is no merit in the sales tax, because this bill places upon the consuming public a sales tax greater than the advocates of any sales tax ever dreamed of imposing.

Mr. President, I desire to call attention to paragraph (e) of section 15, which reads as follows:

> During any period for which a processing tax is in effect with respect to any commodity there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon any article processed or manufactured wholly or in chief value from such commodity and imported into the United States or any possession thereof to which this title applies, from any foreign country or from any possession of the United States to which this title does not apply, a compensating tax equal to the amount of the processing tax in effect with respect to domestic processing at the time of importation. Such tax shall be paid prior to the release of the article from customs custody or control.

I think it rather remarkable that the present administration should be willing to write this paragraph into any law, in view of the attitude of the Democratic Party with respect to the flexible provisions of the Tariff Act. I suppose the answer to this is the same as that made to any other criticism offered on the floor of the Senate with respect to recent legislation, namely, that an emergency exists. But when one takes a casual glance at the arguments made in opposition to the flexible provision of the Republican tariff act it is difficult for him to conceive of an emergency that would overcome such arguments.

I first desire to quote from a speech made by the former distinguished Senator from Missouri, Mr. Hawes, who this year voluntarily retired from the Senate. I quote from the RECORD his remarks of September 30, 1929, page 4081:

Mr. President, the proposal by the majority members of the Finance Committee seems to me to be unfortunate. It is in effect the reassertion of the divine right of the king—that "the king can do no wrong."

I shall not occupy time now in a discussion of the historical background where this power to regulate taxation has been taken away from the ruler of every civilized country in the world, or that republics have been set up and monarchies have been destroyed that the representatives of the people might control this particular power in governmental affairs. Today in every country in the world the taxing power is deposited with the legislative branch of the government.

Where formerly the voice of one man decided everything we have advanced to the thought that the majority shall decide through their chosen representatives.

Not only is the tariff a tempting agency for the acquisition of power which can be used in the distribution of favors, or a power that might be used as a threat, or even the destruction of an opponent in our domestic affairs, but there also enters into it international questions entirely disassociated from our immediate domestic problems.

I desire to follow that quotation by a speech made on October 1, 1930, upon the same subject by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], pages 4093 and 4094 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. President, one of the most disquieting facts about this controversy is the frequency with which the advocates of this transfer of legislative power to the Executive have pointed to precedents. Precedents do not make a thing right. They may only prove that we have been wrong before. At the present time we are on the crest of the wave of Presidential encroachments upon legislative territory. What at first seemed like a harmless delegation of an inconsequential power has, through accretion and addition, so multiplied the power and authority of one individual of this Government that the system of a functional balance among the three great divisions of government is wellnigh upset.

The time is ripe to reject the question, Have we done it before? and, instead, to inquire, Have we not gone far enough, indeed too far, in the direction of centralization? This year the campaign of those who are impatient with the methods of our representative democracy had planned to write into the law "competitive conditions" as the standard of comparisons which was to guide the President in writing his tariff laws. That campaign was successful in the House. It was for a time successful in the Finance Committee. Let us hope that it will not be successful in this body.

I now pass to the next day, to a speech of Senator Swanson, the present distinguished Secretary of the Navy, which appears on pages 4133 and 4134 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This was his idea about keeping the power of the Government with the Congress:

Here we have protected liberty, until now, when it is sought to make an abject surrender of the popular rights of the people which our forefathers would not have thought possible in the great Republic which they founded. This is the issue and it cannot be evaded.

What does it mean when the President is given the power to impose customs duties or tariff taxes on 120,000,000 people? First, that taxes are imposed on the American people by the Executive, and, second, that there is bestowed on the Executive without limit and without stint the power practically of granting monopolies and conferring favors upon anyone according to his own will.

What was the great curse of monarchy? It was the power on the part of the king to grant monopolies to a few to trade in England or in France or in Spain, as the case might be. One of the greatest curses of government until America was settled was the power given to monarchs to show favoritism, to bestow favors upon their particular friends and adherents, to make men rich or poor as the will of the monarch might dictate. In England privileges were given to favorites which resulted in monopolies in the woolen trade, the sugar trade, the cotton industry, and similar favors were bestowed in France and Spain. Court favorites were made rich by the monarchs who had it in their power to bestow such favors. That was one of the abuses denounced in our Declaration of Independence; it was one of the main grievances which resulted in the wresting of the Magna Carta from King John, for the King could bestow favors to the enrichment of his favorites.

Mr. President, what does the flexible provision propose? It proposes to give the President power to create monopolies in America if he shall so desire, and to create them for the benefit of favorite interests; it proposes to give the President the power to determine how 120,000,000 people shall trade. Of all the power ever bestowed in the history of time, none exceeds the power given the President under this flexible provision of the pending bill to bestow favors and monopolies and benefits on individuals, industries, and corporations according to his own will and desire.

I am opposed to that. When a Senator votes for the flexible provision of the pending bill he votes—and he cannot evade the issue—to give that power, that opportunity to the President without stint and without limit, except that the President cannot raise or lower a tariff duty in excess of 58 percent of the rate fixed by the bill. Those who think that such a power as belonged to the kings and potentates of the world in former times should be bestowed upon the President and that the opportunity for favoritism should thus be afforded will vote for the flexible provision of the tariff bill. That is what it means.

In addition to giving to the President this unlimited power of enriching favorites, as he may desire, it confers upon the President the right to impose taxes. I am opposed to that. I think it is contrary to the Constitution. I do not care one iota for the decision which was rendered upholding the flexible provision of the tariff. What did that decision hold? It held that if Congress sees proper to abdicate its power under the Constitution and turn that power over to the President, and if in the opinion of Congress the provisions of the law do not leave any discretion in the President, then the provision is legal. I believe the decision is wrong. From time immemorial it has been held that legislative power cannot be taken away from the Parliament or the Congress when any discretion is left in the exercise of the power on the part of the Executive. That is a fundamental principle. The decision was based on a subterfuge that the flexible provision left no discretion in the President because he was bound by the conditions fixed in the law, but anyone may read the provision and see that it is not specific. It gives the President the discretion to raise tariff duties to the extent of 50 percent of the rates provided in the bill. We should vote according to our idea of the Constitution, regardless of any decision of the Supreme Court.

But, Mr. President, in order that I may bring the Democratic Party a little more up to date upon this subject, let me quote a few extracts from literature sent out by the Democratic committee in the very next campaign, in the year 1930. I shall first quote from the new Ambassador to Spain, the Honorable Claude G. Bowers:

But there is in this provision (the flexibility clause) something more vicious far—it transfers the right to tax from the legislative department to a single man. Now it is axiomatic with our race that the power of the purse shall never rest with the executive department. It was in support of that policy that Charles the First was ushered through the window at Whitehall to the scaffold. Had the Constitution when submitted contained that flexibility clause it would have failed of ratification by a single State. Whenever you entrust to a single man the command of the Army and the control of the purse you pave the way for a centralization of power that ultimately makes for tyranny and oppression.

With this power a President can punish or reward a section; he can penalize or enrich an industry; and, if unscrupulous, with this power he can raise the most enormous slush fund in human history to continue himself in office. We submit that this is too much power to entrust to any man, and we stand on the wise traditions of our race and for the safeguards of the constitutional intent.

Now let me quote from a radio speech of the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] over a Nation-wide hook-up on September 2, 1930. I beg Senators to listen to the charming qualities of an extract from this patriotic speech.

Under this doctrine of centralization of power in the hands of one man the constitutional prerogative of Congress to fix the amount of tariff taxes levied upon the people of the United States was in a large manner handed over to the President. This invasion of the wise provision of the Constitution regarding the balance of power between the three branches of the Government constitutes an assault upon the very fundamentals of the wise system of the founders of the Republic.

Mr. President, can you not hear the Senator from Texas say that now?

Mr. CONNALLY rose.

Mr. HASTINGS (reading):

> Anglo-Saxon liberty had its birth and won its greatest triumphs in its struggle to secure for the representatives of the people the right and the exclusive right to control taxation and to hold the purse strings of the people. This scheme to divest Congress of that power and hand it over to the Executive is but a symptom of the bureaucratic and centralizing policies of the Republican Party.

I am going to make this speech. The Senator from Texas can sit down for a minute. I will let him interrupt me directly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Delaware has no right to refer to the Senator from Texas. I have not addressed the Chair. I have not sought to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HASTINGS. I beg the Senator's pardon. Is there anything more I can do?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think the Senator has done enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. I thought the Senator was about to interrupt me, and I was certain this speech would be so interesting to him that I did not want to spoil it by being interrupted in the midst of it. I apologize for being out of order in assuming that the Senator was about to do what he usually does—interrupt somebody when he is making a good speech. [Laughter.] The Senator from Texas said further:

> It will build up at Washington a giant bureaucracy, gradually absorbing the powers of the States, and now by the device of the flexible tariff depriving the Congress, chosen directly by the people themselves, of its constitutional rights and transferring them to the President of the United States, already the most powerful ruler on this revolving globe.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. In view of the freedom with which the Senator is using the name of the Senator from Texas, does he agree that what the Senator said in that speech was sound doctrine?

Mr. HASTINGS. This doctrine?

Mr. CONNALLY. What the Senator has just read as coming from the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, I do not often agree with the Senator from Texas, and I should not like to answer that question without sleeping on it. [Laughter.]

On May 23, 1930, the present distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. HARRISON] took a little fling at this matter through the Democratic national committee. Here is what he said:

> Through the action of the conference in depriving Congress of the right of levying taxes on the people, they have given greater powers to the President and made another assault upon the fundamental principles of our Government. * * * The Senate proposal preserved the constitutional power of taxation in the Congress.

This is the view of the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], issued also through the Democratic national committee on April 22, 1930:

> The founders of this Government granted the power to levy a tariff tax to their representatives in the Congress, selected from every section of the Nation. This furnishes some safeguard to every locality and section. The Republican bosses now propose to substitute the will of one man for the deliberate judgment of many. It is a scheme to wrest tariff taxing power from the law-making body selected by the people and transfer it into the hands of a party President. * * *
> It would be as justifiable to authorize the President to fix income and inheritance taxes. If executive officers are to fix tariff rates, sheriffs might impose county taxes upon cows, horses, and automobiles, while Governors would fix State taxes for homes and farms. Executives, including the President, are sworn to "enforce the law", not to "enact the law." * * * This bold effort of the Republicans to give the President the power of life or death over every community in America is but a part of a vast scheme to take power from the hands of the people and their representatives and concentrate it in the hands of one man, selected by a political party.
> Freedom-loving people have long since learned that too much power is dangerous in the hands of any group, be it social, economic, religious, or political. Concentration of any governmental power in one individual is a constant menace to the peace and security of any people.

This was followed by the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], who spoke as follows:

> I regard the provision as unconstitutional. It is the most revolutionary proposal ever advanced. It is the widest departure from the plain intent of the Constitution—that the taxing power shall be exercised exclusively by the Congress.

I desire also to quote from a statement of the present Secretary of State, a great student of the tariff, and who, on May 14, 1931, through the Democratic National Committee, commented upon two meetings of business men—one in Washington and one in Atlantic City—in which he called attention to the fact that these business men were apprehensive lest they incur the displeasure of the Hoover administration if they should undertake a serious discussion of the real problems confronting the country and expressing conclusions embodying practical remedies. Here is what he said:

> In view of this state of awe or fear or hope of reward, that seemed to permeate these two recent meetings, an additional and most powerful reason is furnished for the repeal of the present flexible tariff provision, and the substitution of a measure which will restore to Congress, where it belongs constitutionally, the whole authority and responsibility of tariff making.
> The President, or any other official, of course, did not remotely contemplate the intimidation of business leaders for political or any other purpose. The fact, however, that this was not in the slightest degree necessary renders all the more dangerous the mere existence of a flexible tariff agency, which gives the President virtually unlimited power to grant or to withhold almost invaluable favors from many groups of individuals and industries.

Mr. President, I know all of us believe that in the present condition of the country it is important to lay aside all political considerations in discussing these emergency measures which have been submitted for consideration by the President. That is certainly true with respect to the leaders on both sides of this Chamber, but if it be expected by those who are advocating these measures that partisan criticism shall not be heard in the Congress, it seems to me they ought to be reasonable enough to see to it that the measures themselves are free as nearly as may be of any tinge of partisanship. It is impossible for me to read the first paragraph of section 10 without reaching the conclusion that the persons framing this bill at least did not overlook the opportunity it gives them to take care of a great many deserving Democrats. It seems to me that this section is about the boldest thing I have seen written into any law since I have been a Member of this distinguished body. It may be that there is some other explanation for it; but if there be such explanation, I respectfully submit that it ought to be made and be made promptly, and ought to be more specific than that given by the Senator from Texas a little while ago. I desire to read that section in order that the RECORD may show that the attention of the Senate was at least called to it. It reads as follows:

> The Secretary of Agriculture may appoint such officers and employees, subject to the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923 and acts amendatory thereof, and such experts as are necessary to execute the functions vested in him by this title; and the Secretary may make such appointments without regard to the Civil Service laws or regulations: Provided, That no salary in excess of $10,000 per annum shall be paid to any officer, employee, or expert of the emergency agricultural adjustment administration which the Secretary shall establish in the Department of Agriculture for the administration of the functions vested in him by this title.

It will be observed that in this paragraph, unlike many other sections and paragraphs of the bill, there is a limitation placed upon the Secretary of Agriculture. I congratulate the committee on seeing to it that a limitation of $10,000 per annum per person was placed upon the Secretary of Agriculture in the selection of the army of employees that is to operate this act. Of course, it is to be hoped that, with the millions of people out of employment, and with the cities, States, and the Federal Government being stretched to the utmost to furnish food, clothes, and shelter, it will be possible to get many employees for very much less sums of money than $10,000 per annum. We have just passed an act authorizing the President to reduce the salaries of all Government employees by 15 percent, and this applies to the persons receiving $1,000, as well as to those receiving larger sums. The Members of Congress have reduced their own salaries to $8,500 per year, but under this proposed act the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, in his discretion and without limit, to place as many men and women on his pay roll as he chooses, provided that none of them shall receive more than $10,000 per year. Of course, I know the answer is that the Secretary of Agriculture will not abuse this authority; that the President of the United States, with his determination to reduce the expense of the Government, will not permit too large salaries to be paid. But I am pointing out that, so far as the Congress is concerned, the authority passes out of its hands immediately upon the passage of this bill.

In addition to that, as I understand the provisions of the bill, its administration costs the Government nothing; the cost is all paid by the consumers of the Nation, and not only the tax, but the whole expense of administering the law, is to be entirely at the expense of the consumer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has complained bitterly that the pending measure gives the Secretary of Agriculture the power to select employees without regard to the Civil Service law. I wonder whether it would be of any interest to the Senator from Delaware to point out that the same thing was done when, during the last administration, the Congress passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall be very glad to have the Senator point that out.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator did not exhaust his physical resources in denouncing the Hoover administration for passing a measure almost identical in language, insofar as the selection of employees is concerned, with that now under consideration. I thought that perhaps it would be interesting to the Senator to have his attention called to that.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the Senator for his interruption, and I may say, with respect to my physical exhaustion, that I do not know of anybody in the Senate who comes nearer competing with me in that regard than the senior Senator from Arkansas, the Democratic leader.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am honored by the recognition which the Senator from Delaware accords me.

Mr. HASTINGS. I repeat, as I understand the provisions of the bill, its administration costs the Government nothing; the cost is all paid by the consumers of the Nation, and not only the tax, but the whole of the expenses of administering this proposed law, is to be entirely at the expense of the consumer.

A great opportunity is here offered to pay large salaries without it in any way affecting the expenses of the Federal Government.

I am calling the attention of the Senate to this section for an entirely different reason. I am asking why it is necessary to specifically provide in the bill that the Secretary of Agriculture may make such appointments without regard to the Civil Service laws or regulations. Does that conform to the principles established by the Democratic Party? In order that we may know the position of that party with respect to the civil-service laws, I desire to call attention to the planks in their various political platforms, beginning with the year 1904. It seems to me that is long enough to establish a well-known principle. I shall read briefly from those platform pledges.

In the year 1904, under the title "The Civil Service", the party platform declared:

> The Democratic Party stands committed to the principles of Civil Service reform, and we demand their honest, just, and impartial enforcement.

Then it proceeds with about 10 or 12 lines denouncing the Republicans.

In 1908, under the title "Civil Service", the Democratic platform said:

> The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rigidly enforced to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than services rendered to a political party.

In 1912 we find this:

> The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rigidly enforced to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than the service rendered to a political party; and we favor a reorganization of the Civil Service, with adequate compensation commensurate with the class of work performed for all officers and employees.

I turn now to the platform of 1916, and, calling attention to this, I want to show how short it is and, at the same time, to remember that at the time this was adopted the Democrats had been in power for a period of 4 years. It consists of two lines, under "Civil Service", and the declaration is:

> We reaffirm our declarations for the rigid enforcement of the Civil Service laws.

That was in 1916, after the Democratic Party had been in power 4 years. After they had been in power 8 years, and came to the platform of 1920, they erased the two lines entirely, and made no reference at all to the Civil Service. So we do not find them interested in the Civil Service again until they had been out 4 years, in 1924, and by that time they had become very much interested in it again. They have nearly half a page devoted to it by that time. I will not read their denunciation of the Republican administration; it might worry me some, and I will just read what they promised the people they were going to do:

> We pledge the Democratic Party faithfully to comply with the spirit as well as the regulation of civil service; to extend its provisions to Internal Revenue officers and to other employees of the Government not in executive positions, and to secure to ex-service men preference in such appointments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the Senator knows that the pending measure limits its existence to 2 years, and that the President may terminate the employment of those engaged under it by declaring the end of the emergency at any time. Does not the Senator recognize that as the same reason which prompted the provision in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act disregarding the civil service? If a large number of employees were needed to carry out the statute, and they should be made to acquire the civil-service status, it would be hard to secure for them the recognition which the Civil Service laws contemplate. That is the reason, I take it, why under the administration sponsored by the Senator from Delaware the Civil Service law was not applied to employees of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, although the indications are that that organization, or at least a portion of it, will last for a number of years. We hope that the organization to be set up for the enforcement of the pending measure will be eliminated within a comparatively short period. I realize that the Senator may reply that he has no such hope, but I think we are justified in entertaining that belief.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I have not forgotten the question which the Senator asked me a moment ago, and I shall reply to both his questions presently.

I want to follow this examination of the platforms to 1928, when the platform read:

> Grover Cleveland made the extension of the merit system a tenet of our political faith. We shall preserve and maintain the civil service.

Mr. President, that was in 1928. I have carefully gone over the Democratic platform of 1932 and can find no reference in it with respect to the civil service. In view of the fact that the Democratic Party is insisting so carefully on carrying out the President's proclamation and the promises made in that platform, I was wondering, after I discovered this fact, whether that was deemed sufficient excuse for putting this particular provision in the pending bill; in other words, there not having been made any pledge to the contrary, that the persons preparing the pending bill concluded that it might very well be done.

As I understand the history of this legislation, the bill was prepared by the administration, and was sent to the House. The administration had made a study of it. The Secretary of Agriculture made a study of it, and probably knew more about its operations than any other person knew. It was not until the bill reached the House, where it got into the hands of a Democratic committee, that it was changed and this particular provision inserted in it.

I desire to answer the Senator from Arkansas with respect to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation provision. If it were a parallel, I would not undertake to defend it, but it is not in any sense a parallel. In the first place the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a corporation. It is controlled by a board of directors, and in that sense that act is very different from the provision here, which gives to one man the whole and entire right to name all of the employees to carry out the particular administrative features of the bill. But if the fact that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a corporation, and controlled by a board of directors instead of by a single individual, be not a sufficient answer, then I say that there is one thing that robs it of any possibility of being charged as a partisanship measure or being operated as a partisanship measure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think I made the statement a few moments ago that there was in the pending measure a limitation of 2 years, subject to the right of the President to terminate the measure at any time. That was in a former draft of the bill. The provision in the bill now is that—> this title shall cease to be in effect whenever the President finds and proclaims that the national economic emergency in relation to agriculture has been ended, and pending such time the President shall by proclamation—

And so forth. I thought I ought to make that correction in my statement.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the Senator. I should like the attention of the Senator from Arkansas when I am responding to the question he asked me as to what excuse I would give for such a provision being in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act and not being in the present bill. I had called attention to the fact that it is, in the first place, a corporation; that it is being operated by a board of directors——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield further to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is a Government corporation. The salaries are to be paid under the authority of the act. The employment is made and made only under authority of the act, so there is no distinction, either moral or legal, that the Senator can apply.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is a distinction, I respectfully submit to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, in this respect: While it is a governmental function operating through a corporation controlled by the Government, the particular point to which I called attention and the particular thing upon which I insist is that that corporation is absolutely controlled and operated by its board of directors, which is entirely different from other organizations of the Government. But that is not the chief reason. Of course the very purpose of the Civil Service Act is to prevent good people from being turned out for political reasons. That was the object of the act. That was the thing to be secured; and if it be true, as has been said, that Grover Cleveland was the man who brought it about—though I am not certain that it is true but I will assume that it is—it was in order to do away with the spoils system. That was the purpose of the Civil Service Act, and it is the spoils system we try to avoid by living up to the Civil Service rules. That is the reason why it was put in the platform of the Democratic Party, because the Senator and his party wanted the people of the country to believe that that was to happen.

What is the difference between the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act and the provision in this bill? It is that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in its very terms is a nonpartisan organization. It is distinctly provided in the act that there shall not be more than a certain number of one political party appointed on the board. As a matter of fact President Hoover appointed on the board a sufficient number of Democrats to make it a Democratic organization, but they did not undertake to do anything that would change any rule of the Civil Service or in any way cause anybody to complain.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Delaware has referred to the fact that President Hoover appointed a majority of the members of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Board from among Democrats. Of course, the reason he did it was to assure an honest and efficient administration. It cannot be assumed that the Republican President appointed a majority of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from among Democrats for partisan purposes. The only reason he could have had was to assure that there would be an honest and an efficient administration of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Will not the Senator please give the President credit for that? [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. I am a little surprised that the Senator should interrupt me with that kind of a remark.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the Senator's answer? Does he claim that President Hoover was moved by partisan considerations to appoint a majority of Democrats on the board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or does he believe that the President thought that in selecting a majority of Democrats he would get a better administration of the act and so the country would know it would be an honest administration?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am wondering whether the Senator from Arkansas is actually interested in having my answer to his question. I undertake to answer his question, and I hardly get a sentence out of my mouth before he interrupts me by asking another question. I believe the Senator from Arkansas has reached the conclusion that in asking the question about the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and in undertaking to compare that act with the pending bill, he made a mistake, and is using that as an excuse to interrupt me further. That is the only reason why I can conclude that the senior Senator from Arkansas is interrupting me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. HASTINGS. Just a moment, please.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator is challenging my opinion.

Mr. HASTINGS. Have I the floor, or shall I yield the floor to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has the floor; but if he insists upon challenging my opinion and refusing to permit me to express my own opinion, I shall have to submit.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wish the Senator would submit long enough to enable me to answer his question. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware has the floor.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator from Arkansas will just keep still a moment, will just keep quiet a moment——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am going to yield every time the Senator asks me to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is kind of the Senator from Delaware. The Senator undertook to lecture the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] on the assumption that the Senator from Texas was going to do something to interrupt him when he had no intention of doing it and when he did not interrupt. Now the Senator from Delaware undertakes to lecture me for interrupting him and for asking a question, and he undertakes to define my viewpoint as to the manner in which he has answered the question. I respectfully submit to the Senator that I cannot permit him to do that. I think he has totally failed to give me a sound answer to any question I have propounded to him.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator from Arkansas has not given me time to answer his question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How much time does the Senator require?

Mr. HASTINGS. I require long enough to utter one sentence without being interrupted further by the Senator from Arkansas. I am able to answer the Senator's question in one or two sentences if he will not interrupt me. I made the mistake with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and I have apologized to him, and he has very graciously forgiven me. If the Senator from Arkansas will just wait on me a little bit, if it is necessary to apologize to the Senator from Arkansas I will do that also. I have plenty of time, and I am in no hurry, but I should like to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have not indicated any offense. I am entirely satisfied with the performance of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am not trying to put on a performance. I am trying to make a speech, and if the Senator from Arkansas will give me time I will succeed; and if he will give me time, I will answer the questions he has asked me. What I am complaining of is that whenever I start to answer the Senator's question he interrupts me. That is all. I wonder if the Senator knows now what my answer is?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; and I do not believe the Senator from Delaware knows.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well; I will answer again in order that the Senator may get the point.

In the first place, the Senator asked what the difference is between the provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act with respect to the Civil Service law and the provisions in the pending bill. I called the Senator's attention to the fact that the distinction is to be found in this fact. In the first place, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a corporation. It is controlled by a board of directors. It is controlled by a nonpartisan board of directors so that the evils growing out of the spoils system are not apt to enter into that sort of situation.

I called attention to the fact in passing that the President of the United States, at the time the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was created, did not hold a sufficient partisan view to warrant him in seeing to it that that corporation was controlled by Republicans. From my point of view he generously turned it over to the Democrats. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas says that he did that because he could find more honest Democrats and more capable Democrats. I have no complaint to make about that suggestion. All of us have found recently that there are more Democrats of one kind or another than we had hoped were in existence. That was true on election day just as it is true today. But that is the difference between the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act and the pending bill, and I think that is a sufficient answer with respect to it.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer, but——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. It has been remarked in the course of the debate that a Republican President appointed a majority of Democrats on the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I think the Democratic President has reciprocated that courtesy by appointing a Republican as Secretary of Agriculture. The Democrats have shown their trust in him by offering in the pending measure to allow him the privilege of appointing employees at the generous salaries provided.

Mr. HASTINGS. In reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma, I want to say that I would not consider it any particular compliment to the Republican Party if the Secretary of Agriculture should pick the same kind of Republicans as he is to fill all of the jobs to carry out the provisions of the bill which is now before us. I say that without any reflection on the Secretary of Agriculture, too, because while I do not know him personally I know by reputation that he is a very high-class man.

Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate longer, but I do want to make some response to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] who, in his speech upon this subject, insisted that we have had action. He stated that we are getting action, that we have leadership, and that we are going to get somewhere. Well, Mr. President, I cannot get much satisfaction out of that kind of argument. I think it important that we know where we are going and where we are being led. I do not say that in any way of criticism; but I say that I do not know whether we are being led in the right direction or whether we are not. I say that the great leader of the Democratic Party himself admits that he does not know what will be the effect of this particular bill; he states frankly that it is an experiment and he does not know where it will lead.

I say, Mr. President, that this proposed legislation establishes a principle under which, if enacted, there will be placed upon the backs of the American people a tax which ought not to be placed there unless we know when we do it that we are bringing some real honest-to-God results to somebody in the country, at least to some particular class of people in the country. As this particular bill confronts us today, many farmers themselves are opposed to it and do not know that it is going to help them. While it is designed specifically to help them—and while it seems to me, if it will do any good to anybody at all, it must be of some assistance to them—it takes into consideration not at all what shall happen to 92,000,000 of the people of the country who must bear the burden of the tax which we are about to impose upon them, and impose them how and by whom? By the Congress? Oh, no!

The distinguished Senator from Texas asked me a question a little while ago as to whether or not I agreed with him about his statement in reference to the flexible provisions of the tariff act. I said I would think it over and tell him later. I say to him now that there is no comparison between the authority we are proposing under this bill to give to one man over 30,000,000 of the best kind of people in the Nation, who are producing from seven to ten billions of products a year, and the authority which was bestowed under the flexible provision of the tariff law.

In the first place, the flexible provisions of the tariff are administered by a nonpartisan board and then by the President, who is limited to changes of 50 percent up or down, one way or the other. Do Senators mean to say that we have given the President any such authority under the flexible provision of the tariff as is proposed to be given under this particular bill whereby the Secretary of Agriculture can say today that the price of wheat shall be so much and tomorrow he can say it shall be less or it shall be more? He can say what the price of corn shall be this week; he can change it next week.

The President himself has stated that there are features in this bill which if administered by a Secretary who has prejudices in favor of the farmer will result in one set of figures confronting the country, and if administered by a Secretary of Agriculture who has the consumers' interest at heart will result in an entirely different set of figures confronting the country. That is what is proposed to be done. I say there is no comparison. I say to those Senators on the other side of the aisle who have been preaching to us that we must hold on to the authority granted to Congress by the Constitution, who have been preaching to us that as Members of the Senate we must not give to the Executive power greater than that which is given to him in the Constitution, that they had better find out where we are being led. They had better find out before they vote for some of these propositions whether they are going to be to our good and to the good of the country. They had better not rely upon the claim that we are faced with an emergency, that something must be done, and that we had better be "up and doing" so as to give confidence to the people of the country; that we had better be "up and doing" and make the people of the country believe that we are doing something, whether we know what we are doing or whether we do not know.

O Mr. President, in the case of this particular measure there is a course of procedure which we have seen repeatedly followed since the 4th of March. A proposal is something sent here one day that appeals to the conservative people of the Nation, and we hear them praising the President of the United States. As soon as it is rushed through Congress, he comes along then with something that appeals to the radicals of the country, to the liberals of the country, and he pushes that through. He pleases that element, and then he undertakes to please the other side by suggesting some other particular measure. In this proposed legislation he has done two things at once and we have got to swallow them both or not get the good out of either. In this instance I have particular reference to the proposal to help the farmers improve their condition by reducing the interest rate on their mortgages and adjusting the debts on their farms. We find such a provision in this bill. Why was that put into the bill when Senators in the majority know that many of us who would like to vote for it do not dare to vote for the other provisions of the bill, because we do not want to surrender to the Executive all the power that has been given to us by the Constitution?

I apologize to the Senator from Arkansas for getting so excited and to the Senate for keeping it so late.

5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to suggest a unanimous-consent agreement for the purpose of making disposition of a motion which I have heretofore made to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 158, the so-called "30-hour bill", was passed. I will state the suggested agreement. I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill may be temporarily laid aside at 12:15 o'clock p.m. on April 14, which is tomorrow, thereupon the motion to reconsider the vote whereby Senate bill 158 was passed shall be taken up for consideration, and a vote upon said motion shall be had at 1:45 o'clock p.m. on said day. No Senator shall speak more than once or more than 15 minutes, except the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], who may be allowed to speak as long as 30 minutes. I make that exception because the Senator from West Virginia said he wanted that much time, but I do not know of anyone else who wants more than 10 or 15 minutes.

I do not know whether such an agreement will be satisfactory to Senators, but the motion to reconsider has been pending for 3 or 4 days, and I am heartily in accord with the idea of disposing of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think the matter should go over until the morning, and the Senator should take it up then, because, if he insists upon it now, it will necessitate a roll call, and the hour is late.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair inform the Senate that it will not require a roll call to enter into a proposed unanimous-consent agreement for the limitation of debate on a motion to reconsider a bill which has been passed. Does the Senator from South Carolina object?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should prefer that the Senator limit the time to 1 hour rather than to allow the debate to run until 1:45 o'clock.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Only an hour and a half is allowed for debate—from 12:15 to 1:45.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I very much dislike to object, but I wish the Senator would let the request go over until tomorrow.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I merely desire to try to get this matter disposed of. Of course, if my request is held up, meanwhile the motion cannot be considered. I did not have any idea of delaying the question longer than 1 or 2 days when I made the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. I shall have to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I ask who objected?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 13, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O God, the eternal and universal Father, Thy holy name be praised for the length, the breadth, and the intensity of divine love seen in our Savior's holy passion. We pray in humbleness of heart, make us worthy, forgive us our sins, and make us stronger wherein we have failed. Create in us more and more the blessed virtues, showing pity where pity is needed, patience where patience is required, gentleness and forbearance where they will encourage. O may we love where the temptation is to hate, and at all times bear one another's burdens. Teach us, dear Lord, these living qualities of life, and let them lodge in the inner courts of our souls. Brood over our President, our Speaker, and all Members of this Chamber, and help us all to bring forth the morning light of promise to our fellow men that they may have a sweet release from their pressing problems. May Thy kingdom come throughout the world, subduing racial prejudice, hateful dissensions, arrogance, dominating pride, and grasping selfishness, and may the Golden Rule of our gracious Heavenly Father be seen among all peoples. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, has adopted an order relative to the answer of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, an attested copy of which, together with an attested copy of said answer, by direction of the Senate was presented to the House.

PAYMENT OF THE PAGES OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

House Joint Resolution 152

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pages from April 1, 1933, until the end of the first session of the Seventy-third Congress, as follows:

For 21 pages for the Senate Chamber at the rate of pay provided by law, so much as may be necessary.

For 41 pages for the House of Representatives, including 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at the rate of pay provided by law, so much as may be necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I did not know that we had to have a special resolution for the payment of the pages. I thought they came under regular appropriations.

Mr. BUCHANAN. They do, but we have to provide for the special session.

Mr. SNELL. Is this the exact number we had previous to this time?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The exact number and the same amount of pay.

Mr. SNELL. It is necessary, then, because we do not have the appropriation for it under the legislative bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ELECTION TO STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 106

Resolved, That the following Members be, and they are hereby, elected members of the following standing committees of the House of Representatives, to wit:

Flood Control: ROBERT T. SECREST, Ohio;

Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries: FRANCIS E. WALTER, Pennsylvania.

The resolution was agreed to.

EMERGENCY FARM MORTGAGE ACT OF 1933

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 4795) to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to refinance farm mortgages at lower rates of interest, to amend and supplement the Federal Farm Loan Act, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ARNOLD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I think it might be a little refreshing this morning, in view of the wide range of debate that took place yesterday, to recall exactly what this bill is. It does not propose to solve all the problems of agriculture; it offers help only to farm mortgagees.

I come to you from California as an actual farmer myself, representing one of the highly specialized agricultural districts in the State.

I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture for that reason, no doubt. There are a great many things that the Committee on Agriculture and this House cannot consider in connection with any farm problem. Take the matter of local taxes, which must be handled by the State and the counties themselves. Nor could our committee consider the great question of transportation costs, which to my mind—perhaps I am prejudiced because I live far from the centers of distribution, and transportation costs bear so heavily on our farmers—form one great factor that has depressed the farmer's income during the last 12 years.

There is the question of raising commodity prices. This House has taken action in an effort to raise them by passing the first agricultural bill now before the Senate. And the House and Senate both passed, and the President signed, an act which will at least restore the value of two of our great commodities, rice and hops.

I am hopeful that before this Congress is over another agricultural industry of my State, the grape-growing industry, will receive similar recognition and benefit at the hands of the Congress. But, gentlemen, you did not present to us in this bill a question of raising commodity prices or of cutting transportation costs or any other factor except the factor of relief of farm mortgages, and whatever additional benefits any of you may say could be obtained by any other bill, this bill presents at least certain concrete advantages that should earn the support of every Representative in the House who actually wants to benefit the "dirt" farmer.

In the first place, admitting that only 19 percent of the present farm mortgages are held by the Federal farm-land banks and the joint-stock land banks, even those who oppose the bill agree that that 19 percent will be benefited. But I want you to look further and examine the other provisions of the bill. Authority is given to the Federal land banks to purchase and exchange the new bonds that will be issued for first mortgages now held by banks, life-insurance companies, and every form of private lender under provisions which will result in the scaling down of both principal and interest. What has been quite overlooked in this debate, I think, is the fact that the plight of the lender today is almost as severe as that of the borrower.

We had testimony before our committee to the effect that lenders in a certain community were willing to scale down mortgages as much as 40 percent. Is it not reasonable to expect that these lenders will be just as willing to come under the operation of this act as the borrowers? There will be benefit to both, the lender securing a guaranty of the interest on his reduced obligation, the borrower the benefit of the reduction of both interest and principal. I believe that this provision will be so utilized that it will benefit over 50 percent of the mortgages now in existence.

Moreover, for the first time, as far as I know, there is contained in a provision of an act of Congress authority for direct loans to farmers, and I know of no more valuable provision than in title III of this bill. A man who now has a small loan at the bank, who needs money to finance his crops or who has a second mortgage that is practically unpayable, can arrange by adjustments with those to whom he owes money to secure a loan directly from the Federal farm organization. That provision alone would justify the enactment of this bill.

Nor can I bring myself to join some of the gentlemen in shuddering at the provisions of title II for the liquidation of joint-stock land banks. We are all agreed that they should be done away with and liquidated as soon as possible. It is only a question of method. We have written into the bill provisions that any money lent them must be in accordance with a plan approved by the Farm Loan Commissioner. We have gone as far as possible in extending the benefits of this act to borrowers from these banks who may not desire or be able to refinance with the Federal farm-loan banks. The only alternative to assisting the joint-stock land banks to liquidate in an orderly manner is to force them into receivership, and such receiverships would be costly and wasteful and produce no benefit whatever to the present borrowers from these banks. The chief consideration the committee has had has been to put these borrowers in a position where they can be refinanced at advantageous rates and with a reduction of the amount of the principal sums that they owe.

Finally, there are the provisions in title IV, which permit the refinancing of irrigation districts, levee districts, and drainage districts, which are in financial straits, for whom there is no relief now through any governmental agency. I believe that in the western country particularly the provisions of this title will be of vast benefit to the property holders whose land is under a lien of bonds issued by such districts. So, with a realization of these concrete benefits, which are in the bill, and a remembrance that this is only one of a series of bills aimed to restore agriculture, I hope the Membership of the House will pass the bill with a decisive majority. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think I am not only entitled to 2 minutes, but I believe I am entitled to at least a service stripe for sitting here in the front benches every minute since this debate started, without even the protection of a gas mask. I did not vote for the rule under which the bill is being considered, but I do not want any of my good friends to become alarmed, fearing that I may run amuck. I have not seen anything in the so-called "consideration of the bill" to make me doubt the soundness of my judgment in voting against the rule.

I was present in this Chamber throughout the historic scene so graphically described last night by our distinguished leader when we overthrew Cannonism. I have a rather distinct recollection that in the ensuing Congress the precedents of Cannonism were not cited in support of a rule of action by Democrats under the Speakership of Champ Clark. So I am not very much persuaded by the citation of such precedents in the guidance of our action in the consideration of legislation.

I want to direct attention for a moment to title II, at section 202, authorizing a loan of $100,000,000 to joint-stock land banks.

One of the most informative discussions I have heard during the debate was upon and against this feature of the bill by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN]. If what he had to say on this section could have been said under the 5-minute rule for amendments, something would have happened to section 202, and something ought to happen to it.

This section appropriates $100,000,000 to this class of banks to enable them to refinance existing farm loans and to liquidate their affairs and go out of business. The gentleman pointed out—and it will pay you to read his remarks in the RECORD of yesterday, at page 1579—that these banks have outstanding bonds in the sum of $430,000,000, which are down to 25 and 30 cents on the dollar, and that these banks may speculate with this Government money by buying in their own bonds to the extent of $300,000,000, and make out of the transaction a profit of at least $200,000,000. He wanted the mortgagors, the landowners, to be given the privilege of buying these bonds and offsetting them against their mortgages.

The answer from the Committee on Agriculture is that it was given legal advice that this would be unlawful; that a debt past due, such as the mortgage was, could not be offset against a debt not yet due, such as the bond was.

It was pointed out in reply that in order to get this $100,000,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the Federal land banks must agree to scale down the mortgage interest of the farmer to 5 percent per annum and must agree not to foreclose for a period of 2 years for any default in the payment of interest or principal, and that if the Government could impose these conditions, it could impose others. A sufficient argument should be that this is a loan to these insolvent banks and that they must accept the lender's terms or leave it alone. At least, if the mortgagors cannot buy the bonds, the banks ought to be prohibited from speculating in them to their own profit. If the bill was subject to amendment under the rule, it would be at least worth discussing and considering a third condition, as follows: That they, the banks—

Shall agree that no part of the funds hereby made available shall be used by said banks for the purpose of speculating in the bonds thereof.

We had enough speculating with Government farm-relief funds by the Federal Farm Board, and we know the results. It would be better to safeguard this large loan now against any possible diversion from its legitimate ends than to come back here at the next session of Congress and investigate what had been done with the money.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

EMERGENCY FARM MORTGAGE ACT OF 1933

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the legislation under consideration is a part of the program of the administration for farm relief. There is no single solution of the agricultural problem. The pending act deals with farm mortgages. It is an emergency act. The bill provides for refinancing farm mortgages at lower rates of interest, for the liquidation of joint-stock land banks, for refinancing the short-term indebtedness of the farmer to enable him to secure working capital when necessary, and to enable him to redeem or repurchase his foreclosed farm home. The bill further provides for refinancing drainage, levee, and irrigation projects.

Farm mortgages constitute one of the major difficulties confronting not only the farmers themselves but the American people. Banks, insurance companies, and personal investors in mortgage bonds are vitally affected. Another and more potent difficulty is the violent decline in the price of farm commodities. The House has already passed House bill 3835, to increase the agricultural purchasing power, and thus restore reasonable commodity prices. The bill is now pending in the Senate.

I call attention to some important matters that have not been mentioned in the course of the debate. The bill is constructive. Two billion dollars are provided for extending and refinancing farm mortgages. The interest will be reduced and guaranteed by the Government. Unlike other relief legislation, no new bureau is established. President Roosevelt has already consolidated all of the agencies for farm loans. The act will be administered by existing agencies. There will thus be economy in administration.

Fifty million dollars are authorized for refinancing drainage, levee, and irrigation districts. This feature of the bill has been almost entirely overlooked in the debate. It is for the benefit of the land owners and not the holders of bonds. It provides emergency relief for worthwhile districts in the depression. It will aid in the reduction of taxes. The cost of production will thus be decreased. Worthwhile improvement projects for the benefit of land owners will thus be greatly aided by extending the time for payment and reducing the rate of interest.

I have no patience with those who criticize farmers because of their inability to discharge their obligations in the depression. The decline in commodity prices is responsible for their plight. When banks, insurance companies, and railway companies find themselves in financial difficulties and ask relief at the hands of the Government, the farmers of the Nation are not to be criticized for asking for similar aid. Many worthy farmers have lost their homes. A most constructive feature of the legislation is that $300,000,000 are made available for the reduction of the debts of farmers and for the redemption of mortgages that have been foreclosed within 2 years.

TERMS

The Federal land-bank system is strengthened and utilized for the emergency relief. The joint-stock land banks are to be liquidated orderly. Moreover, it is intended that they shall be liquidated for the benefit of borrowers as well as bondholders.

Two billion dollars in bonds with interest not to exceed 4 percent are authorized to reduce or extend the principal of farm mortgages and to guarantee the interest during the emergency. These bonds may be sold or exchanged for outstanding farm mortgages and the interest rate is to be reduced so that it shall not exceed 4½ percent per annum. While no provision is made for the reduction of the principal of the indebtedness to Federal land banks, nevertheless aid is stipulated. Installments on the payment of the principal may be extended for 5 years. The principal is thus deferred. The interest is reduced, as stated. Interest is an important item in the cost of production. Much aid will be provided by relieving landowners from the payment of the principal by the reduction of interest.

The outstanding feature of the legislation is funds for new loans. The need of agriculture and of commerce is credit. Many worthy farmers are unable to borrow at all. The bill provides for loans either through local associations or for direct loans by the Federal land banks themselves. The limitation for maximum loans is liberalized. The limit is fixed from $25,000 to $50,000. Personally, I wish there were no limitation at all, but I recognize that the Federal Government will not be called upon to refinance all farm mortgages. Forty-two percent of the farms in the United States are mortgaged. The Federal land banks hold 12 percent while the life-insurance companies hold 23 percent of the outstanding farm mortgages. Personally, I wish that provision were made for reducing the principal of the loans where the property for any reason is not worth at present the amount of the loan by the Federal land banks. I realize that some agency must administer the emergency relief. Postal savings and other Government funds are invested in Federal land bank bonds.

Unable to reduce the principal because of inability to impair contracts, provision is made for extending the principal and reducing the rate of interest. Provision is made for refinancing existing indebtedness held by other mortgagees, and funds for new loans are provided. The Farm Loan Commissioner is vested with large discretion, and I believe that the Commissioner will exercise the discretion to make adjustments in Federal land-bank loans where there was overvaluation at the time of the loan or where the value of the property has depreciated from any cause whatsoever so that the reasonable value of the property is now less than the principal amount of the loan. While the act is intended to give the Federal Farm Loan Commissioner the power to reduce the amount due on the loan, if the loan is greater than the reappraisal value by Federal land appraisers I have urged the committee to offer the following amendment, which I would offer on the floor if permitted under the rule:

AMENDMENTS

SEC. 8. Section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Fourteenth. At any time within 2 years after this paragraph takes effect, upon application of any borrower who has obtained a loan from a Federal land bank if the unpaid principal of the loan is shown, upon reappraisal by land-bank appraisers, to be greater than the value of the property mortgaged, to reduce the amount due on the loan to the amount of such value and to refinance the mortgage on the basis of such amount."

I have recommended to the committee and would also offer a like amendment in connection with joint-stock land banks. However, I am sure that under the law the joint-stock land banks have the power now, and I understand the power has been exercised in many cases, to make settlements and adjustments in cases where it develops the value of the property is less than the amount of the loan.

Again, the bonds of joint-stock land banks are now worth less than par. I want to aid these banks, but I want to aid them so that the banks can aid their borrowers as well as their creditors. I want to be fair both to creditor and debtor. The borrower knows he is being discriminated against when the joint-stock land banks can discharge their obligations by paying from one third to one half the face value of their obligations, whereas the borrower is required to pay the full value of his obligations. In many cases worthy borrowers have been foreclosed and the banks have resold the property and have profited by the transactions. Such was never the intention of the law. I do not believe that the Farm Loan Commissioner will permit such a practice in the further administration of the law. However, I have urged the committee to propose, and if I were permitted I would offer on the floor the following clarifying amendments:

Page 14, line 12, strike out "and."

Page 14, line 20, before the period, insert: "and (3) shall have agreed that in any case in which the proceeds of any loan made under this section are used for the purchase of outstanding bonds issued by the bank at a price less than the par value of such bonds, the bank shall make a reduction in the unpaid principal of all mortgage loans held by such bank equal to the difference between the total amount so paid and the total face value of the bonds so purchased, and the reduction made in the unpaid principal of each such mortgage loan shall be an amount which bears the same proportion to the amount of such difference as the unpaid principal of such mortgage loan bears to the unpaid principal of all mortgage loans held by the bank."

Joint-stock land banks are to be liquidated and are not permitted to make new loans. The liquidation is to be orderly. There are to be no foreclosures within 2 years. The interest is to be reduced to 5 percent per annum. Loans are authorized by the Farm Loan Commissioner to joint-stock land banks to prevent foreclosures and to provide for reduction in interest.

With many others I condemn most emphatically the policy of some joint-stock land banks in foreclosing worthy borrowers who are endeavoring to carry on and in reselling the property with profit to the banks themselves. The Farm Loan Commissioner has broad discretion. The emergency loans to the joint-stock land banks for orderly liquidation are primarily for the benefit of the borrowers. The Farm Loan Commissioner will exercise the discretion to prevent further injustices to borrowers. It is not just, it is not right, that borrowers should be expected to repay in full loans contracted on the basis of 20-cent cotton with cotton at 5 cents a pound when the joint-stock land banks can purchase their obligations at 40 cents on the dollar. The debtors and the creditors, the mortgagors and the mortgagees, the farmers and the bondholders should all participate in the losses and in the benefits of the loans for orderly liquidation of these banks. I should like, as I have stated, to see an affirmative provision in the bill that would authorize adjustments with landowners where mortgages to the joint-stock land banks are for excessive amounts. These banks should make adjustments with borrowers in the case of excessive loans or in the case of loans where there has been a deterioration so that the borrowers can repay the values of the lands. The Federal Farm Loan Commissioner, in the exercise of the discretion under the terms of the act, will give both debtor and creditor the square deal authorized under the discretion vested in him under the terms of the act.

THE RULE

There has been criticism of the rule under which the bill is being considered. It will be kept in mind that the bill deals largely with contractual rights. Ill-considered or hasty amendments might affect the validity of the entire bill. The committee considered the act most carefully. While amendments are limited, they are not prohibited. Any Member of Congress can secure consideration of any proposed amendment. It will be considered by the committee just as the bill itself was considered and reported by the committee.

During the course of the general debate substantially no other constructive amendments have been proposed. A substitute has been suggested. This substitute may be offered under the motion to recommit.

OBJECTIONS

The minority report favors the so-called "Frazier bill" to provide for the refinancing of all farm mortgages at a rate of 1½ percent. Provision would be made not only for refinancing the farm-mortgage indebtedness of 1933, estimated at $8,500,000,000, but for repurchase of farms foreclosed in the past 12 years. Personally, I wish that the rate of interest might be less than 4½ per cent provided by the bill. I know of no way for the Government to secure money either for itself or for the farmers except to pay for it. The rate of interest in the bill is not to be in excess of 4½ percent. It may be less. The rate of interest is determined by the amount that the Government has to pay as interest on long-time bonds. It is untenable to assert that the Government can issue Federal Reserve notes bearing 1½ percent interest to discharge its obligations or to provide for farm loans when Government bonds are now bringing from 3½ percent to 4 percent. Again, the Government cannot be expected to finance all farm mortgages. There would be discrimination against individuals and against institutions. Government aid in farm mortgages is to assist and not to take the place of private agencies. Loans by private agencies should be encouraged. Government aid is to prevent abuses by private agencies.

The farmers are in difficult plight. Their situation is made worse by misleading statements. All laws are imperfect; all laws have their defects, but Congress, by and large, has made provision for loans to farmers at as small rates of interest as have been extended to other borrowers.

MERCHANT MARINE

It has been said that under the Merchant Marine Act of 1920 and the Merchant Marine Act of 1928 the United States provided loans for shipping for less than the rate of interest provided for farm loans in the pending bill. The rates under the Merchant Marine Act of 1920, which aggregated about $18,000,000, were substantially the same as the rates under the pending emergency bill. Under the Merchant Marine Act of 1928, loans aggregating $130,000,000 have been made and the rates of interest at first were very small. The Merchant Marine Act of 1928 provided that the loans for foreign shipping should be made at a rate of interest comparable to what the Government was paying for loans at the time. The low rate of interest on the initial loans made under the act of 1928 was never contemplated. In 1931, when the situation was brought to the attention of Congress, the act was amended to provide that the rate should not be less than 3½ percent for foreign vessels and 5¼ percent for coastwise vessels. It will be kept in mind that the purpose of the Merchant Marine Act is to promote foreign commerce and to provide for the national defense. Under all the loans the vessels are constructed in accordance with the requirements of the Government and may be taken over at cost in the event of war. We remember that enormous sums of money, millions upon millions, were expended for building ships in the World War. The Merchant Marine Act will thus provide for foreign trade and for national defense.

FOREIGN DEBTS

Those who would mislead the farmer into believing that Congress is deliberately discriminating against him argue that the debts of our former Allies in the World War bear a rate of interest less than the rate of interest provided for mortgages in the pending bill and that therefore the rate of interest should be reduced. The answer is twofold. The rate in the act may be reduced, and in the second place the two cases are not analogous. It will always be remembered that the rate of interest on the foreign debts was not on loans made or money advanced at the time of the transaction. These debts were war debts. They were contracted as war measures. The advances were almost wholly used in the United States in the purchase of wheat, cotton, and other commodities and materials. The money was expended in the United States in the case of both war and postwar loans. The rate of interest in the funding agreements was not on advances made or loans contracted at the time the rates were fixed. The foreign-debt settlements were made in an effort to collect obligations due the United States. Even with the reduction of interest, several nations are in default. They have not paid with the smaller rates of interest. Some statesmen assert that the United States should follow the course of Andrew Jackson in forcing the collection of foreign debts. The amount of the French indebtedness to the United States during the Jackson administration was approximately $5,000,000. It was finally paid. The facts of the indebtedness in the Jackson era and the facts of the indebtedness growing out of the World War are altogether different. It was not a case of allies or common cause.

What is the alternative if our former Allies refuse to pay? Who would advocate another war to collect the debts? Foreign-debt settlements were an effort to collect obligations already incurred for the relief of the American taxpayers.

FARM LOANS

It is not fair to say that Congress has deliberately discriminated against farmers in the matter of rates of interest. Under the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1929 a revolving fund of $500,000,000 was authorized and the full amount was appropriated. The rates of interest on the loans were substantially the provision originally incorporated in the Merchant Marine Act of 1928. It stipulated that in no case should the rate exceed 4 percent. Under the law money was advanced for agricultural relief by the Federal farm loan at rates of interest from one eighth of 1 percent to 3⅝ percent. The aggregate loans under the Agricultural Marketing Act amounted to $1,118,445,788.32, from the adoption of the act to April 1, 1933.

Whatever may be said of the rule under which the bill is being considered, the only substantial objection has been by the advocates of the Frazier bill. There is no gag rule in their case. A motion to recommit will permit a vote on the Frazier bill. A substitute of the Frazier bill would mean no legislation at all in the emergency that confronts the farmers of the Nation. They need refinancing. Ill-considered and uneconomic refinancing would be worse than no refinancing at all.

The arguments with respect to interest on merchant marine loans and on foreign-debt settlements are without merit. I agree that a mistake was made and that too small a rate was charged in some of the merchant marine loans, but when the Government has made a mistake, when a wrong policy has been pursued, the remedy is not to repeat the mistake but to correct it. If the rate of interest in other cases has been too small, the remedy is to correct it in future legislation.

We have heard too much in advocacy of appropriations from the Federal Treasury by those who urged the appropriations because previous unfair and unjust appropriations have been made. Every appropriation should stand on its own merits. All legislation should stand or fall on its own merits. The Government cannot lend money for less than it can borrow it. The mere issue of Treasury certificates or Federal Reserve notes will not suffice. There must be sound financing by the Government. Of course, there is room for the expansion of the currency. Such expansion must be sound. The present administration has made provision for expanding the currency in excess of $2,000,000,000. If such expansion does not do the job, there will be further sound expansion of the currency.

The emergency act is a further step in the right direction. It is constructive, will benefit farm owners, and should promote the return of normal conditions.

EMERGENCY FARM RELIEF

In further extending my remarks, I call attention again to the fact that the House has already passed the administration measure, H.R. 3835, to increase the agricultural purchasing power. The purpose is that the purchasing power with respect to articles bought by the farmers be equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the pre-war period from August 1909 to July 1914. The bill is intended to maintain a balance between production and consumption. Since 1928 the prices of farm products have dropped an average of 60 percent, while the decrease in farm purchases or articles purchased by the farmers has been only 29 percent. The price level of farm commodities is only 50 percent of the pre-war level, while the prices paid by farmers for things bought by them is 102 percent of the pre-war level. Farm taxes are more than 2½ times as much as they were prior to the World War. Such a condition is intolerable. There are 6,000,000 farmers in the Nation. The purchasing power of 30,000,000 people has been substantially eliminated. Manufacturing is adversely affected. Transportation has been crippled. Banking has been paralyzed. There can be no prosperity for industry unless there is prosperity for agriculture.

I have no patience with those who say that legislation cannot aid the farmer. Manufacturing has profited from high tariffs. The railways have increased their rates as a result of congressional action. Loans have been made to banks and insurance companies. Farmers are entitled to the equivalent of the relief extended to manufacturing and commerce. The administration seeks to relieve agriculture. The emergency farm relief bill heretofore passed by the House, as I have stated, is now pending in the Senate. The purpose is to increase the price of cotton and other major agricultural commodities to at least the pre-war level. There can be no economic recovery from the existing depression without reasonable increases in commodity prices. The measure was proposed by President Roosevelt. It is the emergency farm-relief plan of the administration. The redeeming feature is the statement of President Roosevelt that he will be the first to acknowledge and to advise Congress if the act does not produce the desired results. In his message recommending the passage of the bill the President frankly stated that the legislation was a new and untrod path. He emphasized, however, that unprecedented conditions called for new and unprecedented remedies.

Another redeeming feature of the legislation is that the President may terminate by proclamation the provisions of the act with respect to any commodity after the emergency has ended. It is also provided that any of the powers conferred upon the Secretary, or any other provision of the bill, may be terminated by the President if he ascertains that they are not necessary to carry out the declared policy of the act.

THE OBJECT

The object is to restore the pre-war purchasing power of cotton and other basic agricultural commodities. For instance, on February 15, 1933, cotton was selling at 5½ cents per pound. The aim of the bill would be to raise the price of cotton to the pre-war level of 13 cents per pound. The goal will not be immediately reached. The demands of the domestic and foreign markets will be considered. The consumers are to be kept in mind. The bill provides that in the readjustment no larger percentage of the consumer's dollar shall be expended for agricultural commodities than was returned to the farmer in the pre-war period.

BROAD POWERS

To accomplish the declared policy of the Farm Relief Act broad powers are conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture. While they are broad, they are flexible. While they are broad, they are limited. There must be no increase in price to the consumer. The Secretary is authorized to provide for reduction in acreage or production, to enter into marketing agreements, to license processors, to use the Smith cotton-option contract to reduce acreage, and to impose excise and process taxes on agricultural commodities.

Marginal lands may be rented. All agreements are to protect the public interest. They are to be made only for the purpose of effectuating the return of the pre-war purchasing power of agricultural commodities. They are to promote gradual establishing and maintaining the balance between production and consumption. Unfair practices by processors and other agencies are provided against.

It is intended to aid the grower, but the manufacturer or consumer is to be protected. The domestic manufacturer is especially protected. There are imposed taxes upon imports to protect domestic manufacturers. They are safeguarded against foreign competition. Both consumer and producer are protected against substitutes. The compensating tax will prevent a substitute.

The act will be self-supporting. There is no price fixing in the bill as passed by the House. There is to be no Government subsidy. Domestic markets are encouraged and foreign markets are promoted. Cotton and manufactured products will move in export just as they do now, free from any tax.

The vice in previous agricultural legislation was that similar relief was provided for all commodities. In the administration bill the powers are flexible. Different methods may be applied to different commodities. In fact, different methods may be applied to the same commodity. The act is intended to give to wheat, cotton, and other products of which we produce a surplus the equivalent benefit of the tariff. The tariff reserves to the American manufacturer the domestic market. The bill would increase the domestic price of cotton just as the tariff increases the domestic price of manufactured articles.

SMITH COTTON OPTION

The Smith cotton option plan is incorporated in the act. It provides for reducing cotton acreage substantially 30 percent. It will take from the market the cotton now controlled by the Federal Farm Board and the Secretary of Agriculture. By decreasing production there is to be an increase in the price of cotton.

It is my thought that the Smith plan will be the only part of the bill to be incorporated certainly for the next year with respect to cotton. Frankly, I have grave doubts as to the so-called "allotment plan." I do not believe it to be applicable to cotton. The features of the plan in the pending bill have been very materially liberalized. The provisions are flexible and the plan is voluntary.

CONSUMERS

Consumers are protected. Wages are safeguarded. The consumers do not receive the benefits of reduced prices in agricultural products, anyway. The whole purpose of agricultural relief is to reduce the cost of distribution. The taxes provided by the bill will only slightly affect the retail price. Bread prices are the same as in 1913, but wheat was twice as high in 1913 as it is in 1933. Doubling the price of cotton would increase the price of a cotton shirt selling for a dollar by 2 cents. In the case of cotton goods only a small percentage of the retail price goes to the farmer. There can be no prosperity for the manufacturer unless the farmer is able to produce the necessities of life.

ADMINISTRATIVE COSTS

The costs of administration have been safeguarded. It has been said that the employees are to be exempt from the civil service and classification acts. The legislation is needed immediately. There is no time for civil service examinations. A similar provision was incorporated in the legislation authorizing the establishment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In the pending bill, however, no salary of any employee, officer, or expert will be in excess of $10,000.

VOLUNTARY AND SELF-SUSTAINING

The legislation is self-sustaining. Subsidies are not contemplated. Bureaucracy is discouraged. No great administrative force is needed. Existing agencies are to be utilized. There will be no further stabilization operations. In the reorganization of the farm-loan agencies of the Government, President Roosevelt by Executive order eliminated the provision for stabilization contained in the Agricultural Marketing Act of 1929. Public funds will not be used for private purposes. The sooner the Government gets out of all business, the better.

After all, the success or failure of farm relief depends upon administration. The present administration has demonstrated that it is determined to aid agriculture. The provisions of the bill are flexible. The powers are broad. The act will be terminated when the existing emergency has ended.

Under the leadership of President Roosevelt, the House is about to take another step to restore normal agricultural conditions. It has passed the emergency farm bill. It will now shortly pass the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act. Agriculture will thus be given not only a new but a square deal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention or desire to speak upon this bill, but I am constrained to take the floor to explain my vote and position upon this legislation.

It is the desire and wish of all good citizens that their country should be right, just, and fair toward all men and other peoples and nations. And yet there comes a time in the affairs of citizenship, men, and nations when men must stand by their country, wrong or right, in order to safeguard the institutions of civil life and to maintain peace and order under the forms of government and law.

While political parties were in no wise provided for in the Federal Constitution or by any statutory law under the Constitution, political parties have become necessary to organize the voters, to enable them to express their will and wish at the polls in the exercise of the right of franchise on election day. For every voter to undertake to nominate candidates, elect public officials, or declare policies of government, each acting separately for himself, without party organization or cooperation under a political party, would bring about greater confusion at the ballot box than the confusion of tongues at the Tower of Babel.

Political parties have come as vital necessities in the administration of government and the direction of public affairs. They are today a part of our governmental agencies as fully, completely, and effectively as if originally provided for in the organic law creating Government, State, and Nation. Under this system of political parties which has grown up under custom and usage the political party in power and directing public affairs becomes the Government itself. And when the time comes under a great emergency or crisis for men to be with their Government, they must be with their party, wrong or right, to be with the country, wrong or right. We are now in a state of economic siege or industrial warfare, under which Congress has seen fit to confer extraordinary powers to meet and deal with the crisis as in an armed conflict, to cope with a formidable foe.

I have not determined to support this bill on its merits as a farm-relief measure. I am supporting this bill more to maintain the prestige of the party administration and directing the Government, more for psychological effect, more to maintain and stabilize the wavering, swaying public minds, the unrest of the people brought about by want, suffering, and distress in the midst of plenty and great abundance. I have determined to support this measure until legislation can be considered and enacted affording substantial and practical relief.

If I believed this measure was all that was to come, all that could be looked to for farm relief, I would despair of hope for farming and agriculture. I would leave this hall of inanimated flags and statuary and seek seclusion and solitude in fasting and prayer. I would appeal to Almighty God as the last resort for the rescue of agriculture from the blight of this scourge or depression, and from the menace threatening a system of landlord and tenant in America.

There are some parts of this bill beyond understanding, or at least none of which the proponents of the bill have undertaken to explain. But there are many problems of life which are impossible of solution—the problems of birth, life, and death, the problems of time, space, and eternity, all beyond the powers and comprehension of men to solve. We must accept all these without solution and live on.

But there are other provisions of this bill which might be explained and should be explained before the roll is called. It should be explained to the Members of this House how the laboring man today who cannot buy enough milk for his children at the present price, can buy more milk at a higher price, without his wages being raised to meet the increased price of milk. It should be explained here how we can levy and collect a tax upon the consumer of farm food to raise the price to the producers of farm food without correspondingly increasing the consumer's earnings and income to meet the increased price. It ought to be explained, also, to the farmer themselves, how the farmer can raise less and have more.

It ought also to be explained how the Government can finance and make loans mounting in the myriad millions to the banks of the country, to the railroads of the country, to the insurance companies of the country, and assume the debts, obligations, and losses of widespread failing and defunct industries while at the same time supporting 14,000,000 people in enforced idleness and assuming the obligation of $2,000,000,000 more to take up farm mortgages in default and national insolvency and bankruptcy. It ought to be further explained and made certain as to whether this $2,000,000,000 obligation assumed in the name of farm relief is all for the farmers or for the relief of money lenders and mortgage holders now unable to collect interest or principal on their debt. Even under the most advantageous administration of the operations provided for, the farmers will still owe the debts, will still be obligated for the interest, and with no provision under which to increase their earnings and income with which to pay and satisfy the liens against their land. The Government is to guarantee the payment of the interest coming due to the debt holders, but without a guaranty or without an opportunity afforded to the farmers of the means and ability to pay to save their farm homes for themselves and for their children.

The most earnest and insistent friends of this bill will only say that it is an experiment which they hope will afford some relief, sometime, now or in the far-distant, hazy future. They further assert, and this with positive assurance, that the bill can make conditions no worse. This is the one claim and theory of the bill with which I am in full agreement and accord, that is, that if it fails of relief it can make conditions no worse, as under present conditions it would appear that conditions could not be worse. Upon this claim of the bill I will take my stand. Upon this rock I will build my castle of justification, here I will make my defense for support of the bill. My position will be impregnable on the grounds of merit of the measure to meet the crisis at hand.

But here is a remarkable departure from emergency measures. The house is on fire. The fire department has arrived. The hose is connected with the hydrant. All is ready to throw the water and stop the blaze. The water or, in this case, the currency supply is full and ample and ready to be made available for the emergency but the fire engines are stopped to experiment with a new and unknown chemical without knowledge or assurance of the effect as to whether it will add to the flame or extinguish the fire. Such is the role assumed by the ultraconservatism of the day.

But this bill will not remedy the cause of this farm crisis, even directly or remotely. This farm panic or depression was brought upon the country by a fall of values, or the price level, taking away from the farmers their earnings and income, destroying their taxpaying power, their interest-, debt-, and mortgage-paying power, and leaving them without surplus means, without buying and consuming power to provide the necessaries of life, and live. This fall of values and the price level was caused by the secret contraction of money and credits by international financiers and manipulating bankers deliberately to double, triple, and multiply the value of their property, their money, and certain war-debt claims and bonds.

Under this secret contraction of money and credits the relative value of money and the price level was deliberately and criminally changed to take from the people their substance and property—calling for double, triple, and fivefold the farmer's corn, wheat, his farm crops, and stock to pay and satisfy the same taxes, interest, debts, and mortgages. This bill leaves this multiplied and crushing debt burden still weighing down upon farming and agriculture, and under which the farmers will remain powerless to pay and live.

There can be no relief from this panic until there is a rise of farm values and the price level, a restoration of farm earnings and income. And there can be no substantial or permanent rise of values and the price level until there is a restoration of money and credits secretly contracted and withdrawn from circulation. Until there is a restoration of money and credits the farmers of the country will remain without hope. And unless there is such a restoration promptly and without delay the farmers' cause is lost. And we are left face to face with a landlord and tenant system in America with the former farm-home owners as tenants, with their children to inherit their servitude and to work under the lash of farm-corporation taskmasters.

The remedy to avert this crisis and disaster does not call for so-called "inflation." This remedy does not even call for expansion of the currency. It calls for a restoration of money and credit, secretly contracted and withdrawn from circulation under a financial conspiracy deliberately entered into and carried out under the veil of a gentlemen's agreement. This bill will not restore the volume and supply of money necessary to raise values and the price level and give back to the farmers their tax-, interest-, debt-, and mortgage-paying power even without the means or surplus necessary and required to provide the necessaries of life, and live.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I favor this bill because I believe it will bring relief to the farmers of this country; but I believe the relief will only be temporary, for if this bill is passed the same manipulators who have been in control of the financial system of this country for the past 12 years will still be in control and can create such depression as is now prevailing throughout the Nation at any time they so desire. Therefore this bill can only bring temporary relief.

What the country needs is a system of finances which will keep sufficient money in circulation at all times to properly conduct all the commercial affairs of the Nation. Under our present system this policy cannot be carried through, as a few manipulators who are now controlling the circulation of money desire otherwise. The Constitution plainly commands that Congress shall issue money and regulate the value thereof, and until Congress performs that plain, simple command of the Constitution we may expect such depressions as the one now prevailing throughout the country. The object of this bill is to aid farmers who are unable to pay the principal and interest on farm mortgages which are now held against their farms. Bonds are to be issued by the Government bearing interest upon which money is to be secured in aiding the farmers to pay the mortgages against their lands, the Government guaranteeing the interest payment upon such bonds. It is estimated this interest will amount to about $80,000,000 annually. Instead of creating this vast indebtedness by bond issues, why not the Government issue currency, which would place plenty of money in circulation to carry on the business of the country? This would enable the farmers to sell their products at a profit, thereby enabling them to pay the interest and also the principal of the mortgages against their farms, and with a system which would keep sufficient money in circulation at all times—would prevent the return of such depression from which the country is now suffering. But unless this is done, as I have already said, the relief brought about by this bill will be temporary, and such depressions will return at any time the few financial manipulators who are now controlling the circulation of money in the country cease to allow proper circulation of same.

If Congress will obey the plain mandate of the Constitution in regard to issuing money and not farm out this principal function of government to a few malicious manipulators, all business, including the farming interests, will be relieved, and such depressions as the one now afflicting this Nation would be made impossible. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TERRELL].

Mr. TERRELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss this bill in connection with the agricultural relief bill already passed and now pending in the Senate, as it is a companion measure in carrying out the present agricultural relief plans. The Senate Committee on Agriculture has added this farm mortgage bill and some other material amendments to the farm bill, and I desire to discuss them all together, discussing first the price relief bill and, second, the farm mortgage bill. This double-barrel bill in the Senate reminds me of the Negro's fish-trap—it is set to "ketch em gwine and cummin." It contains the "allotment plan", the "buy-a-bale plan", the "cost-price plan", the "processor's-tax plan", the "farm mortgage relief plan", the "drainage levee and irrigation district relief plan", and, finally, a plan to bankrupt the Government of the United States by excessive bond issues and high interest rates.

No man can lift himself up by his boot-straps and no government or individual can get out of debt and remain out of debt by borrowing money at a high rate of interest.

There is not a Representative in this House whose district will not be affected by some phase of this "omnibus bill", and the prospect of borrowing money from the Government to liquidate debts appeals to many people and brings pressure upon Congress to enact this kind of legislation.

These various propositions are embodied in this bill by amendment in the Senate, to gain votes from various sections of the country affected by its provisions. I believe in every tub standing on its own bottom, and every proposition standing on its own merits, if it has any merits; and if it has none, let it fall by its own weight and not tack it on to something else to bolster it up; and I believe further, that every measure of such vast importance to the people should be carefully considered and not passed under gag rule with no opportunity to amend it, as is now being done.

I am a practical farmer with many years of experience at the plow and with 10 years' experience as commissioner of agriculture of the greatest agricultural State in the Union, and I have close contact with every phase of agriculture, and I believe that I know what the farmers want and what they need.

The real "dirt farmers" would not favor this bill if it were properly explained to them, but they are suffering from high taxes and low prices, and like the drowning man, they will "catch at a straw." Some of the farm leaders favor this bill because they hope to get a good job with the Government in assisting in the administration of the law. All the experiments with farm-relief legislation, like the Marketing Act and Farm Board, have failed with tremendous loss to the Government, so why repeat these great losses by taxing the people another billion dollars to try a new experiment when a practical remedy is in sight? The farmers are tired of being fooled. They ask for bread and you give them a stone in the form of more bond issues and more taxes.

If you are going to try to raise the prices of farm products by legislation—and they must be raised for the stability and safety of all industry—there are but two ways to do it. First, and the sensible way, is to adopt a sound and honest money system controlled by the Government in accordance with the mandate of the Constitution, with the dollar stabilized at a fair exchange price for the products of the farm and factory, with ample money to supply purchasing power. This will raise the level of prices and we will not need this kind of legislation. Second, if we are going to try to raise prices by experimental and artificial means, it would be better and less costly to let the Secretary of Agriculture estimate the amount of staple farm products named in this bill needed for world consumption and make voluntary contracts with the farmers to grow that amount and guarantee a price to cover the average cost of production and a reasonable profit similar to the Simpson amendment embodied in the Senate amendment, which leaves out any profit to the grower.

The growers will voluntarily sign such a contract and comply with it when guaranteed a profitable price, but not otherwise, and this contract can be signed in 30 days through existing agencies. If perchance a surplus is grown, the farmer must carry the surplus, and it would be taken into consideration in estimating the next year's allotment to be grown.

Not a man in this House understands or can explain the agricultural relief bill. To prove this, I quote from statements in the Senate discussion of the bill as follows:

Senator LOGAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee [Senator SMITH] if he is entirely sure that he can explain so we can understand them the different principles in this bill?

Senator SMITH. No, sir; I am going to read the bill and tell what it makes an assault with intent to do. [Laughter.]

It strikes down our constitutional safeguards and surrenders the powers of Congress by giving dictatorial powers to one man to do everything and accomplish nothing for the people.

It is my opinion that when prices are stabilized on a basis of proper supply that the trade will fall in line with the Government and purchase the products at the price named by the Government without license or an excessive processing fee and without the threat of a $1,000 per day fine for doing business without a license, because they will be protected against violent fluctuations in prices and can deal safely in these products just like they did in wheat when the price was fixed by the Government and no loss was incurred. There has never been a permanent surplus of agricultural products, and would be no surplus now if the people had the money to supply their needs, and they will never have the money until they are paid a profitable price and idle laborers are employed and given purchasing power.

If perchance the trade did not take the products at the price named by the Government, it would be cheaper and easier for the Government to pay the growers the difference between the market price and the Government price rather than continue with experiments like those of the Farm Board and processing taxes embodied in the farm relief bill, where heavy losses have been incurred under the Farm Board and are almost sure to be incurred under this bill. Besides this, the licensing of dealers and processors and the collection of a processing tax amounting to probably a billion dollars will cost the consumers more money than it would require to pay the difference between the market price and the Government price, and the policy of this processing tax with heavy penalties would shake the foundations of the business structure of the country, built upon a century of successful business experience.

The Government can easily go too far when it undertakes to control by law the operations of farmers and business institutions, except to protect the public against unfair business transactions which rob the people of the fruits of their toil. Such measures as this are contrary to the genius of a free people and were never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution and are not authorized by that once sacred document.

FARM MORTGAGE BILL

The farm mortgage relief bill is a little "sop" tacked onto the agricultural bill to grease it so it can be more easily swallowed. I should be glad to support a measure offering some real relief for the farm-mortgage indebtedness, to reduce the interest rate and stop foreclosures; but this bill provides for a bond issue of $2,000,000,000 with an interest rate to the farmers of 4½ percent, which is not much relief compared with the low price of his products, the only means through which the debt can be paid. I am for the Frazier bill, with some changes, which provides for the issuance of bonds to take up these mortgages at the rate of 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent on the principal on the amortization plan, and am not for this subterfuge which continues to make the Government subservient to the bankers by guaranteeing the interest and establishes the bankers permanently with their hands in the Public Treasury. Under the rule adopted, we are not permitted to offer the Frazier bill as an amendment.

I want to cut loose from bankers' control of the money of this country and drive the moneychangers from the temple of the Treasury of the United States, and this is the best time to do it and make them do business on their own money and permit the Government to resume control of the money in the interest of all the people. Why should the Government delegate its credit to a few people to control the credit of all the people?

Every banker who has United States bonds eligible to the circulation privilege can get interest on $2 for every dollar he owns. If the Government would pay me $2 for every dollar's worth of products I make on the farm, as it pays the banks for their bonds, my farm would be self-supporting.

The banks have had this Government by the throat long enough, and they have demonstrated already that they cannot be trusted to handle the Government funds and deposits of the people unless these deposits are guaranteed. Do not take my word for this statement, but take the inaugural address of the President delivered March 4 of this year and see what he says. I quote:

> Our distress comes from no failure of substance. We are stricken by no plague of locusts. Compared with the perils which our forefathers conquered because they believed and were not afraid, we have still much to be thankful for. Nature still offers her bounty and human efforts have multiplied it. Plenty is at our doorstep, but a generous use of it languishes in the very sight of the supply. Primarily this is because the rulers of exchange of mankind's goods have failed, through their stubbornness and their own incompetence, have admitted their failure, and abdicated. Practices of the unscrupulous moneychangers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.

This country must have more money upon which to do business without issuing bonds and borrowing it from the bankers. We now owe about $21,000,000,000, and this bill proposes the issuance of two billions more, with various projects, adding about five billions more of bonded debt without any way of paying the debt except to borrow more money and pay more interest. Under such a system the property of the people is mortgaged for generations to come.

We must either issue Treasury notes without interest to pay for these projects or we must increase the metallic base for the issuance of more money by the free coinage of silver. This latter plan would enable us to trade with the silver-using countries of the world on more equal terms than is possible under the gold standard alone. The whole country is overbonded and industry is overcapitalized with fictitious stocks and bonds, upon which the people are paying exorbitant charges. We must squeeze the water out of these overcapitalized industries and scale them down to a fair cost value so they can earn a fair interest on the actual cash value of the investment.

If Government bonds drawing interest are a safe basis for issuing money—and the bankers say it is, and it is the method now used by the Government to increase the amount of money—why is not a Treasury note bearing no interest, printed on the same press that prints the bank note, just as good as the bank note, when it has the strength of the Government and all the taxpayers behind it? I should like for some "bloated bondholder" to answer this question: "What will be used as a basis for currency when the bonds are all redeemed, if that ever happens?"

The question of the soundness of money and the proper supply of money can and should be regulated by the Government, regardless of what basis is used, as it is purely and solely a Government function.

This question of money has caused trouble before, and it has been said that money is the root of all evil. I am sure that the lack of money has caused much suffering.

Andrew Jackson met the money power during his administration by vetoing the bank bill, and Congress could not pass it over his veto, so the Government was divorced from domination by the banks until it was gripped in a great Civil War, and the banks got control again and established the national banking system, and they have had their hands in the Public Treasury ever since, and secured a death grip on the Government during the World War.

Abe Lincoln checked them for a time when they tried to hold the Government up for an exorbitant interest rate, and he issued his greenbacks and told them the Government was able to finance itself and would do so, unless the banks would lend the money at a reasonable rate. He carried his point and preserved the Union.

To emphasize my position I insert quotations from the Senate Agricultural Committee in reporting out the agricultural relief bill, as follows:

> In reporting this favorably we feel that we should advise the Senate that, in our opinion, the bill will not alone afford the relief which the farmer must have to enable him to survive economically.
> Prior to the bank holiday some 12,000 banks failed, resulting in the destruction of some 20 billions of bank credit or deposit money. With the ending of the holiday, additional thousands of banks failed to open, resulting in the temporary if not permanent destruction of additional billions of what we call and use for money.
> During the past 3 weeks the Federal Reserve System has disposed of bills and United States Government securities in the total sum of over $1,000,000,000, Reserve-bank credit has been contracted in the sum of $956,000,000, and the money in circulation has been deflated in the total sum of $1,185,000,000.
> We report these facts and state that no substantial relief is possible for agriculture until the policy of deflation is not only checked but reversed, and a substantial sum of actual money is admitted and, if need be, forced into circulation.
> Agriculture demands an adequate supply of honest and sound money and at this time we have neither.
> Agriculture does not demand a 50-cent dollar or an unsound dollar, but does protest the retention of a 200-cent dollar. A dollar which fluctuates in purchasing power from 50 cents in 1920 to 200 cents in 1933 is neither a sound nor an honest dollar. Dollars so scarce as to be obscure, thereby forcing into existence systems of barter, trade, and scrip, are not adequate.
> Agriculture demands that the farmer should have a 100-cent dollar; that the purchasing power of the dollar should be fixed and established at the point to serve the best interests of the people, trade, commerce, and industry; and that when such value is once fixed, it should be stabilized at such value.
> We report further that no just, substantial, reliable, or permanent relief can be provided agriculture or any other industry until the money question is considered and adjusted.

We are not permitted under the rule to offer amendments to the bill. If there is any relief in it, the holders of bad mortgages will get the relief.

Where the property securing the mortgage is worth the money, the holder of the mortgage is not going to scale the debt or accept a lower rate of interest, and this law does not and cannot make him do so. Then only the holders of bad mortgages, where the property is not worth the money, will take advantage of it and exchange their almost worthless mortgages for good bonds, with the Government guaranteeing the interest at 4½ percent.

This is a mortgage holders' relief bill, and the only way we can protect the farmers' interest is to recommit this bill with instructions to bring in a bill similar to the Frazier bill, bearing interest not exceeding 3 percent, including interest and sinking-fund retirement upon the amortization plan.

It is claimed by those supporting this bill that the bankers will not buy these bonds unless the interest is 4 percent. If they refuse to buy them, then the Frazier amendment proposes that the Federal Reserve banks shall buy them and issue money on them, just as the Government issues money on the bonds for the bankers, and increase the volume of money in circulation and let the farmers have it at this low rate of interest until we have $75 per capita and raise the price level of all farm products. There is a provision in the Frazier bill to retire some of this money when the proper price level is reached, and this is a scientific method of controlling the issuance of currency.

The Government is now lending billions of dollars through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to banks, railroads, and insurance companies at about half the interest rates charged the farmers under this bill, and the farmers, as well as the taxpayers, must make all losses good. So why not give the farmers as low interest rates as are given the banks, railroads, and insurance companies, when they are as much entitled to cheap money as anybody? This is a clear discrimination between the farmers and the other classes.

My only hope for any relief for the farmers under this bill and the farm relief bill already passed the House is for the Senate to amend them in such manner as to offer some substantial relief to the farmers, because they take time to deliberate and offer amendments, and the House denies the right of any Member to offer amendments to secure any real relief.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted for debate no man can properly discuss the merits of this bill. We listened to the chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES], who gave his explanation of the bill, and I wish to compliment him by saying he has the high respect of both Republicans and Democrats, because they know he acts with the utmost sincerity. I am sure he has tried to get as good a bill as would be permitted to pass, but I am satisfied he would like to get one much stronger than that here presented. This is true equally of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE], the leading Republican on the committee, who has always been a champion of agriculture and has great interests in his own State, as I have in my own State, the first dairy State in the Union, with New York and Minnesota closely following.

I shall not speak on the drastic rule because those in the majority carry responsibility for the fact no amendment can be permitted on this bill under the rule. They must accept that responsibility with the rule, as adopted.

I was a member, Mr. Chairman, of the Committee on Ways and Means when we settled the World War debts over a decade ago, and when we gave authorization for their settlement I had something to do with drafting of the amended resolution. Let me say, from our committee, Mr. Crisp was placed on the Commission. So was Mr. Burton, from the House, and others in Congress. From that resolution eventually was drafted an agreement with France that France would pay her $4,000,000,000 debt, of which $1,650,000,000 occurred after the armistice, at 1.62 percent interest. The face of the loan was cut cash value about 50 percent. We settled with Italy for 25 cents on the dollar for over $2,000,000,000, also running 62 years at 1⅛ percent, based on ability to pay. That was our generous treatment with these debtors. I can show you hundreds of good farmers in my district who, on the basis of ability to pay, cannot pay 1 percent of interest because of heavy taxes they have to meet. They are certain to lose their farms unless able to obtain the cost of production and a reduced interest rate.

I believe in the merits of what is known as the "Frazier bill" for reasons briefly to be outlined. I do not know that you are going to permit it to be offered as a substitute or as an amendment to the bill. I do not know that it is going to be submitted under the iron-clad rule you have on a motion to recommit; but I say to you, if not, the responsibility is on your side. The principles of the Frazier bill ought to be adopted. Our American farmers should be treated as fairly as we treated the foreign countries named, and their ability to pay must be taken into consideration as was done with great European governments, or our people are liable to lose their farms. [Applause.]

In St. Paul last summer I talked with the president of the Federal land bank. I asked him how many of his mortgages were subject to foreclosure. He said over 50 percent were in default. This is the situation confronting the country at this time. I want to give further reasons why lower rates of interest should be adopted at this time and shall offer definite data of other Government loans. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, at this time let me say I have voted for every agricultural aid bill reported by the Agricultural Committee and believe the President would extend needed aid to the farmers of the country if possible to get his advisers to agree, but this bill to refinance farm mortgages fails to give material aid to those most in need beyond a 5-year moratorium to those who have ample security to offer.

Agriculture is in greater distress than ever before in all history, and between taxes and interest burdens this bill gives little relief; but on the contrary it carries slight hope to the great army of farm owners in the country. It has been described as a nibbling bill by those who are most deeply in need of help—a bill that helps banks and insurance company mortgage holders, but not the man who pays.

Last campaign generous promises were made for farm relief, and complying with those promises the farmers of my State and of the West generally swung over to the Democratic column. Only once before in a half century has my State been carried by my friends across the aisle. In 1928 President Hoover received 98,000 majority in Wisconsin. In 1932 President Roosevelt received 360,000 majority, or a turnover of more than 450,000 votes in our State. Wisconsin, for example, is a typical agricultural State. It leads all States in production of dairy products, and in its wonderful agricultural development, fine farm homes, and advantages of education is among the first, with sister States of New York, Minnesota, and Iowa of like agricultural interests.

The great political swing to President Roosevelt by the farmers of the country came from a belief he understood their problem and their needs. The allotment bill now in the Senate seeks to give some aid to the cost of production on a limited list of farm products. This bill seeks to reach the other side of the ledger by cutting down farm costs.

Twenty-one States have asked for the Frazier bill through their legislatures. That bill is now being urged in the Senate by Senator FRAZIER. It provides for an annual 3-percent payment by the farmer on his mortgage, of which one half is to be for annual interest and the remainder for amortization of the mortgage debt. Confronted with heavy tax burdens, that payment seems about all he can pay under present conditions, and is only about one half the annual return proportionately received from France and Italy by our Government.

The bill before us, with its stock contribution, reaches 5 percent, with many hurdles for the farmer to jump before he can get that slight reduction in interest rates.

With that picture before him the American farmer, over 50 percent of whose mortgages were in default last summer in the Federal land bank at St. Paul, asks what consideration does he get either in ability to pay or reduction of interest rates compared with European debtors whom we helped to win a war to save the world for democracies, largely turned into dictatorships.

I have supported practically every effort of this administration to bring us out of the slough of business despond. Every economist admits that the buying power and prosperity of agriculture, our greatest industry, is needed before any genuine permanent relief can be had. What then is the prospect offered?

For many campaigns I have supported my party organization and 11 of these have been in Congress. It has been a precept with us that when the needs of the people were not recognized or cared for by our party that it was the duty of the official to act first for those he represented, irrespective of party policy.

Here we are confronted with an iron-clad rule by the Democratic House majority which prevents any amendments to the bill. We ask for interest rates recommended in the Frazier bill. Our State legislature has memorialized Congress to that same end. All the 435 Members of the House are permitted to do is to talk and beat their heads against a wall. Possibly little more can be expected from the Senate. What then will the farmers do? The responsibility is with those who made campaign promises 6 months ago when looking for votes. To expect farmers to quietly take their beating after receiving those promises and ignoring memorials from 21 State legislatures is for the Democratic majority of the House to explain.

Bill H.R. 4795 is this long-heralded measure to refinance agricultural indebtedness and at low rates of interests, as was expected by the bill. Every Member of the House, I assume, is anxious to give adequate aid to agriculture, if afforded a chance to vote on amendments that could be offered but for the rule. Never before in all history has agriculture been subject to so many disadvantages and disastrous results as an industry. That relates also to the all-important necessity of receiving cost of production, which long ago has vanished from the picture, not due so much to overproduction as to underconsumption now affecting both domestic and world markets.

Agriculture also faces the highest taxes every imposed in its history. State, county, town, gas, and other taxes present a problem to every farmer under the most favorable circumstances, but practically 50 percent of the farmers of the grain- and dairy-producing sections of the country are facing mortgage indebtedness in addition to other financial obligations.

These mortgages and taxation of the farmer's property are not based on equitable grounds, for he is required to pay taxes on the entire farm property, although his equity after deducting mortgage indebtedness may not reach 25 percent of the value of the farm. This is not an unusual situation. Unable to earn cost of production for his crops or to pay taxes levied by a local assessor who visualizes everything the farmer owns, the debtor faces interest rates upon his debts, whether placed with Government agencies or at local banks, that absolutely prohibit any hope of recovery.

Business disaster has come to a large portion of people in every industry, but the farmer now finds his home and little property accumulated to protect himself and family in later years subject to complete loss through the situation that confronts him.

This administration, overwhelmingly returned by the people with both branches of Congress supporting the President, is able to grant needed relief. The bill before us, H.R. 4795, affords no adequate relief.

It provides for the refinancing of mortgages held by the Federal land banks if the value of the farm land to be mortgaged equals 50 percent in excess of the amount to be reloaned. In addition 20 percent of the value of improvements will be taken into consideration in fixing the total amount to be loaned.

At present farm values in my State and practically every other agricultural State, farm property could not be sold in many cases in open market for the value of improvements placed upon it. In other words, the reloaning value provided in the bill fails to give adequate relief to the great majority of farm borrowers.

The bill before us fixes an interest rate of 4½ percent, providing stock is purchased under the provisions of existing law, or an average interest rate of about 5 percent. While this is a slight reduction over existing interest rates, it is far in excess of rates compared with what the Government has fixed with other debtors in past years.

As stated, a 5-year moratorium to prevent foreclosures is of benefit to those who can get by under present conditions.

Mr. Chairman, agriculture is faced with the problem of "ability to pay" recognized by the French settlement, and if agriculture is afforded a loan of $1,650,000,000 at 1.64 percent annual French interest rates, which is less in fact than terms proposed by the Frazier Senate bill, then 6,000,000 farmers will at once face prosperity promised during the last campaign. Every citizen connected with any industry must desire that farm aid in order to secure a part of the prosperity sure to be reflected in business generally.

The principal amount loaned by the American Government to European governments is not certain to be repaid, and settlements long ago arrived at by mutual agreement are now urged for cancelation by great financial interests of this country.

The average farmer is just as intelligent and with equal understanding as the man found in Wall Street or in the average legislative body. He may not have the same means of expressing his needs, but never before in American history have hundreds of thousands of honest, law-abiding farmers in this country engaged in opposing court decrees for foreclosure proceedings and preventing their execution, never before have thousands of these law-abiding farmers in desperation destroyed their own farm products in order to bring attention to their distress and force buyers to pay cost of production. The allotment bill passed by the House, now in the Senate, seeks to aid in returning cost of production, but heavy farm debts are also a factor in every case.

The bill before us contains provisions which may be helpful to farmers not reduced to extremities, and one of these provisions as stated is set forth in the 5-year period exemption during which interest accumulations, though defaults, cannot be prosecuted through foreclosure proceedings. Other provisions of the bill are helpful to a limited number, but with opportunity for granting adequate aid the bill before us is disappointing and should be amended in either the House or the Senate to meet the agricultural situation. That can only be had with the aid of the overwhelming Democratic majority in both branches of Congress.

The average American citizen will not be able to understand that 435 Members of the House under a rule voted by the majority are tied hand and foot without privilege to offer any amendment to the bill as presented by the committee. It must be swallowed whole or rejected. One motion to recommit back to the committee alone is permitted. It is significant that this long bill of 23 pages can only be voted up or down by the House today. Significant I say, because the figure "23" relates to the farm problem where over 50 percent of mortgaged farms are in default subject to foreclosure and sale.

I am in favor of the minority report, and am glad it was my privilege and opportunity to have placed on the Agricultural Committee my colleague, Mr. BOILEAU, of Wisconsin, who so ably presents in that minority report the inadequacy of this bill. As he well says, he strove in committee to have it liberalized so as to better meet agricultural needs. If subject to amendment, it would be vastly improved from the farmers' viewpoint.

Members of the House who are glad to help even in a small way to bring aid to the farmers will agree with the minority statement that those signing that report desire the bill be amended as recommended, but make no commitments with regard to their final votes in the absence of such amendments. In other words, rather than lose legislation helpful to a limited number they will not vote against a bill that fails to meet the necessities of the great majority.

In the Senate opportunity for proposed amendments will be given through more liberal rules governing that body; and the Frazier bill will be offered, I am advised, as an amendment and given a fair test by those who understand the problem now lying at the base of business recovery. If given like opportunities in the House, the terms of the Frazier bill or supporting that principle would in my judgment pass this body. Instead of the two-million tax-free bond issue proposed in the bill, I believe the House, if given opportunity by amendment, would substitute an issuance of currency by the Government similar to that advocated for payment of the soldiers' bonus, without additional bonds. A party majority of nearly 200 Members has passed the House rule that prevents any amendment. The Senate is free to act.

Personally, I am familiar with efforts of leading officials of agricultural organizations throughout the country to bring about adequate relief to agriculture. My own State and my own district, ordinarily prosperous and outstanding in its wonderful dairying industry, is suffering from the general depression. It is not agriculture alone that asks for relief, but whatever assistance can be granted to 6,000,000 farmers of this country together with approximately 30,000,- 000 members of farmers' families will by reason of increased buying power give general relief to every other industry in the country. If this bill is not amended as urged by the minority report of the Agricultural Committee, then a new measure should be introduced and passed at the earliest possible day. The President through his advisers has thus far exercised large influence in passing helpful legislation. Promises made to the farmers during the last campaign should be kept. Those of the minority can only point out the failure of this bill to meet such promises in the manner I have briefly indicated. Relief should be extended by this Congress.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill because it is the best bill we could possibly get to refinance farm mortgages under present conditions and circumstances.

Do not understand me to say it is the best bill that could have been written, because there is nothing so good it can not be improved.

If the $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds to be issued by the Federal Land Bank, the interest being guaranteed by the Government, can be sold for cash, then this bill will succeed absolutely and unqualifiedly, because it will give the administration the cash with which to make a real composition of farm-mortgage debts and bring them down within the ability of the farmer to pay off his mortgage and retain his farm and not lose the earnings of a lifetime during this temporary but tragic depression.

Passing from this, I am specially interested and specially enthusiastic about section 301 of this bill, with the amendment that is going to be offered by the committee. Why am I enthusiastic? Because this section absolutely procures the cash money in the amount of $300,000,000 to refinance farm mortgages, with a real composition of the principal and the interest, or both. This $300,000,000, if properly administered, will refinance $1,500,000,000 of farm mortgages. Let us see how it will do this. Let me give you a simple illustration:

Suppose a man has a mortgage on his farm of $10,000. The security is not extra good because the value of farms has gone down 81 percent since 1920 and 36 percent since 1928. The Government says to the mortgage holder, "If you will knock off $2,000 and reduce your interest rate from 6 percent to 4 percent, the Government will lend the farmer $2,000 more as a credit on your reduced principal."

Now, what will be the result? On the $10,000 mortgage, as it now exists, bearing 6 percent interest, the farmer would have to pay in interest alone over a period of 20 years $12,000. Under the refinancing proposition provided by this section, what will he have to pay? The interest charge for a period of 20 years on the reduced mortgage of $6,000 would be $4,800 and the interest charge over a period of 20 years on the Government loan of $2,000, at 4 percent, would be $1,600. Adding this together you have $5,600, which the farmer has saved on his mortgage over a period of 20 years under the refinancing composition plan.

What else does he save? He saves an amortization fee on the reduced amount, which would be $400, and he saves $2,000, which is the amount of the reduced principal, and adding the $400 and the $2,000 and the $5,600, the farmer secures a saving on the $10,000, under his present mortgage, of $8,000.

Thus over a period of 20 years the farmer would have to pay $12,000 interest on the mortgage as now outstanding, while under the refinanced composition he would have to pay only $4,000, all of which will more clearly appear from the following figures and fact:

REFINANCING FARM MORTGAGES—FINANCIAL BENEFIT TO FARMER ON THE BASIS OF A $10,000 MORTGAGE THROUGH REDUCTION OF PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST

Refinance plan

(a) Mortgagee reduces principal from $10,000 to $8,000 and interest rate from 6 percent to 4 percent per annum.

(b) Government loans farmer $2,000 to make a further reduction in principal from $8,000 to $6,000, charging the farmer 4 percent per annum on loan and taking a second mortgage of $2,000.

(c) Farmer agrees to amortization payment at rate of 1 percent per annum to liquidate Government loan of $2,000 and reduced principal of $6,000.

Result

Interest charge over period of 20 years on present mortgage of $10,000 at 6 percent per annum		$12,000
Interest charge over period of 20 years on reduced mortgage of $6,000—(a) and (b)—at 4 percent per annum	$4,800
Interest charge over period of 20 years on Government loan of $2,000 at 4 percent per annum	1,600
Saving to farmer in interest payments		5,600
Plus saving on present amortization payments of 1 percent on $2,000 by which present mortgage is to be reduced		400
Plus saving in reduction of principal from $10,000 to $8,000		2,000
Total saving of farmer in principal, interest, and amortization		8,000

Summary

On a refinanced mortgage of $10,000 upon the foregoing premises the farmer would be saved $8,000. The mortgagee will continue to carry private agricultural credit to the extent of $6,000, and the farm mortgage of $10,000 will have been refinanced by the Government at a low rate of interest with a loan of only $2,000. Thus $1,000,000,000 would refinance farm mortgages to the value of $5,000,000,000 and reduce carrying charges on such mortgages through reduction of principal and interest more than 50 percent.

That the mortgagees will gladly agree to such composition has been abundantly established in various conferences during the past 6 months. The farmers, through no fault of their own, have suffered a tremendous loss; the mortgagees are ready and willing to bear a part of that loss. This section of this bill gives them a real opportunity to make a real composition upon a fair basis with adequate consideration.

The decrease of the gross income from $11,741,000,000 in 1928 to only $5,240,000,000 in 1932 demonstrates the deplorable financial distress all farmers are now in, but the condition of the farmer who in addition to other burdens has a mortgage on his farm is indeed tragic. We have extended financial aid to banks, railroads, and other industrial corporations. The farmer is more worthy and in greater need than they are or were; therefore let us pass this bill without further delay.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, after having heard the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN] on yesterday, I regret more than ever that this House has seen fit to tie our hands by the passage of the rule which was adopted on Tuesday afternoon which prevents the offering of amendments to improve the measure.

There are a great many new Members in the House, and if I may, I wish to go back some 16 years to the time of the Sixty-fifth Congress, which went down in history as a rubber-stamp Congress. Nearly all the legislation that was brought in to the Sixty-fifth Congress came up from the White House, was brought in on the floor of this body by special rule, and you could not dot an "i" or cross a "t." The result was that in 1918 the complexion of the House was completely changed to our advantage on this side of the hall, because the people wanted a Congress that would show some measure of independent thinking.

Mr. Chairman, I realize, as you all do, that this is a most critical period, but, certainly, there is not a man within the sound of my voice who will contend that we would have lost any time by taking this bill up in the regular order.

A number of speakers who have made a close study of this measure say it is not going to do the things that its proponents claim for it, and yet they are going to vote for it, because they hope there is a modicum of benefit for agriculture in some of its provisions.

I do not see how it is possible for the Committee on Agriculture to report out a measure containing the defects that were pointed out to the House yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLANNAGAN]. That is a mystery to me and, Mr. Chairman, judging by one or two of the talks that have been made on the floor this afternoon, some of the gentlemen who voted for the rule on Tuesday are hearing from home, because they are beginning to explain their vote for the gag rule.

I do not believe the damage we did on Tuesday is irreparable, but I may say to you that if this is going to be the established policy of the majority in this House throughout the Seventy-third Congress, your present majority will melt like snow under a July sun in the Seventy-fourth Congress, and we again will secure control of the House. I am not speaking as a partisan, but I do think that the situation is such that we should pass the best possible legislation, and I cannot call this the best possible, because too many members of the Committee on Agriculture, as well as others, have pointed out serious defects in this legislation, and yet our hands are tied, and we are powerless to improve it.

We are unable to better it one iota.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. Have the farmers of your State suggested relief by the municipalities?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I have introduced a bill to permit school districts to borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I probably shall vote for this bill, and I am going to do so with reluctance, but I am going to vote for it on the theory that it contains some helpful features. I regret exceedingly that you have made it impossible to improve the bill as it should be. I am going to plead with you that you make the rule that you adopted on Tuesday the last one you will adopt in this Congress, unless it is a political measure like the tariff. You cannot throw the tariff open to amendment because that is a political question. This is not a political question. You will find men on both sides of the aisle voting for and against it. [Applause.]

I shall vote for the Boileau motion to recommit this bill to the committee with instructions to substitute the so-called "Frazier bill" for section 3 of the pending measure. I consider the Frazier bill one of the most helpful measures to agriculture now pending in either House of Congress. Indeed, it is the only bill that I know of which promises real relief to the American farmer.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I shall address myself only to section 5 of the bill, and shall so do for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee to clarify the statement he made when he explained the bill Tuesday.

This section increases the maximum size of the loans. The chairman gave us to understand that this was for the purpose of reaching conditions brought about by certain loans in the joint-stock land banks. He said that there were a few loans that were good and ought to be preserved, or something of that sort.

What I wish to have him make a matter of record is whether it is his thought that the new financial set-up will make fresh loans between $25,000 and $50,000.

Mr. JONES. Such loans may be made, but must have the approval of the Farm Loan Commissioner.

Mr. LUCE. I realize that, but I want to know if that is to be his policy?

Mr. JONES. Of course, that will depend altogether on the funds they have and the need for the loans. I take it that loans of that character would be the exception. We gave the authority, with the approval of the Farm Loan Commissioner, and I take it that means that the policy will not be to make those loans generally.

Mr. LUCE. I regret much that the chairman of the committee has put it in just that way. Members of another committee who no longer have jurisdiction have considered this proposal——

Mr. JONES. The reason for going as high as $50,000 is it was thought that as the joint-stock land banks were being liquidated, the privilege might be extended in exceptional instances.

Mr. LUCE. If that is the purpose of the gentleman, very well; I have no objection to that; but to put it into the power of any man to increase the size of the loans generally would be a calamity.

When the law was originally drafted, the limit was placed at $4,000. In the Senate that was changed to $10,000. The biggest mistake ever made by the committee that has been handling the matter was to permit the extension to $25,000, and the men in charge of the institution will so tell the gentleman from Texas. The Farm Loan System was conceived as an instrumentality for helping the small farmer. I protest against putting it within the reach of the gentleman farmer or the industrial farmer, the man who has large capital invested. I protest for the reason that $50,000 lent to one man takes money which might have provided ten $5,000 loans to men who need them for livelihood. [Applause.]

I have a great regard for my friend from Texas, and I ask him to consider his own connection with this bill. I should regret if the country came to characterize this measure as "JONES' $50,000 bill." I hope, for his own sake, that he will not expose himself to the criticism of the small farmers of the country, the great mass of the farmers of the country, when, through all these years, the Committee on Banking and Currency, or, at any rate, some of its members, have tried to prevent this very thing.

Mr. JONES. The thought was presented in reference to certain ranches and special cases that it is necessary to have refinancing, otherwise those farms might be broken up and put into increased production.

Mr. LUCE. They are not the farms of which we usually think as such. They are businesses, and you are refinancing the well-to-do man who ought not to have to resort to this particular type of refinancing.

Mr. JONES. But this is to be the exception, not the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I shall take part of these 2 minutes to emphasize the fact that it was needless to phrase the provision in this way in order to meet the exigency of joint-stock bank mortgages. You do not know who is going to be your next administrator. Perhaps you may rely upon the present one, but you expose him to the pressure of the wealthy farmers of the country, and you expose his successors to that pressure, and the first thing you know you will find yourself in a worse position than you are in today through having extended the maximum to $25,000. I reiterate, the biggest mistake the Committee on Banking and Currency ever made was to extend it to $25,000, and it was done over the protest of a number of members of that committee, of whom I was one. I have had the safety and the success of this institution very much at heart, and it has interested me more than any other matter coming before the Banking and Currency Committee. I have hoped to see here applied successfully the cooperative idea. Because I have done everything I could to foster this enterprise, I deplore now endangering it as is proposed by this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I shall take a moment in my own right. This is a bill for refinancing farm mortgages. It is hoped that some of these mortgages of all character may be refinanced. Some of them are outstanding, in bad shape, and in the larger field it may be necessary in exceptional cases to refinance the larger mortgage, as the joint-stock land banks are being liquidated. If those larger farms are forced on the market and denied the privilege of refinancing, in exceptional cases, which the Farm Loan Commissioner himself must personally approve, they may be forced into liquidation and be cut up and divided and at a time when we have all of the production that we need along those lines. I am very glad to have the gentleman's suggestion, and when the bill is in conference I shall call his suggestion to the attention of the conferees.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, we have before us one of the most important bills that has been before this Congress, and I am pleased to know that the chairman of the committee now says if we have any suggestions to make they will be glad to consider them in conference. It is a strange situation in the consideration of this important measure, that we should be invited by the chairman of the committee to make our suggestions, with the assurance that they may be considered by the conference committee. We are going through the form of considering this legislation and yet from the very outset, through the adoption of a rule by the majority side, we are not permitted to even make the change of a single word in the entire bill for its improvement.

No business or enterprise can long survive unless its products can be put upon the market at a price that will pay the cost of production, and that is just as true of the farm as it is true of the factory. It is because the farmers of the country have been unable to sell their products at a reasonable price that we are called upon today to refinance them.

I call attention now to the rate of interest we are proposing to charge in refinancing them. This interest rate of 4½ percent is entirely too high. It ought to be reduced, and in my judgment it would be reduced if the rule I have referred to had not been adopted and the bill had been left open to amendments on the floor of the House. I think there is no question about that. It occurs to me that those of you who are interested in the farmers of the country should have acted when the question came upon the rule and should have amended the rule permitting an opportunity to offer proper amendments to a bill which affects every farmer in the United States.

Just a short time ago Congress provided for loans to other institutions at a small rate of interest. There is no reason in the world why the farmers of the country should not be treated just as well as anyone else. There is no reason in the world why we should not refinance the farmers of the United States as cheaply as we can refinance anybody else in the United States. [Applause.] If you will give to the farmer a price for his product so that he can receive a reasonable sum for what he raises on the farm, if you will give to him a reasonable rate of interest on his refinancing—and his securities are better than any other security in the world—you will be placing him in a position where he can reestablish himself and do much to aid in restoring the country to normal conditions. To me it seems almost mockery to go through the consideration of this important bill with our hands tied, not permitted to offer a single amendment to the bill. I protested when this rule was before the House, and I protest now, that we should have an opportunity to place in this bill proper amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. If this bill had been open for amendment I believe it would have been greatly improved and a bill passed which would have been a great improvement over the bill that was introduced at the beginning of the debate.

The situation of the farmer is critical and the need of this legislation is great, and I am hoping that much good can come out of this, but it seems to me that for this great body to go through 3 days of consideration of this bill without the slightest opportunity of doing anything except make suggestions, which the chairman of the committee has finally said he would give consideration to when he came to the final consideration of the bill in the conference committee is a waste of time.

We should have the right to offer amendments or make whatever suggestions we wish to make if we can improve this legislation, which is so important to the farmers of the United States. I am hoping before this bill is completed that the Agriculture Committee may suggest amendments on the floor, that we may have an opportunity to reduce the interest charge, to give the farmer the opportunity to sell his products at a reasonable price and place him on an equal footing with other business and industry. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] has again expired.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I yield the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] 1 additional minute in order to answer the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. McGUGIN. In this connection, just to keep the RECORD straight, would the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] mind adding to his remarks that every Republican Member voted against this rule which made it utterly impossible to amend this bill, and every vote cast for the rule which makes it impossible to amend the bill came from the Democratic side of the House?

Mr. DOWELL. And may I suggest that when it comes to legislating for the farmer, politics has no place. What we ought to do is to do something in his interest and not upon any lines except purely in the interest of the farmers of the United States.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DOWELL. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. In that connection, politics should not have dictated this rule vote, as it did the other day, should it?

Mr. DOWELL. It should not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL].

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman and fellow members, I am going to vote for this bill. It is not exactly what the farmers of this country want, but I am not going to excuse myself by finding flaws and that is why I shall support it.

I call your attention especially to title IV, section 401, lines 17 to 20. Under that language a great many of the people in my district who are farmers will get relief. Take, for instance, the fruit growers of the Tieton project, who have spent their time, their money, their all, for the past 20 years in planting orchards and building fine homes. During the past decade progressive deflation has been their lot, and the prices of their products in the past few years have been insufficient to pay even the running expenses on their farms. They have exhausted their reserve funds. They have borrowed to the limit, and years of water charges and taxes have pyramided their indebtedness beyond endurance. Hundreds of them will be compelled to leave their homes and lose their all unless they get immediate relief. Without water their orchards, many of them 10 and 15 years old, will dry up. A source of income to themselves and wealth to the State in normal times will be destroyed completely. They are not to blame. They are hard-working, efficient farmers who under normal conditions are independent and self-supporting.

Throughout the agricultural counties of my State, over 50 percent of the taxes are delinquent, reaching 70 percent in 1 or 2 of the counties.

This bill will not give entire relief. It is a temporary measure. We hope for and expect more permanent relief. For the present, longer terms of credit and lower rates of interest are necessary. But what the farmers eventually demand is a stable and profitable price for their products sufficient to cover all the costs of production, including taxes and interest on money invested. They do not want more credit but an opportunity to pay off their indebtedness and have enough left over to enjoy the blessings of this wonderful, modern, machine age, and to keep them in comfort and happiness in their old age.

Government statistics in 1929 disclosed the fact that 504 men in the United States received a net income equal to the gross income of all the cotton and wheat farmers in the United States, approximately 2,300,000 farmers. Let us abolish tax exemption on all securities and enact substantial income, inheritance, and gift taxes. Let us inflate the currency so as to bring back the pre-war purchasing power of the farmer's dollar. Let us adjust the inequitable tariff barriers which have destroyed the fruit and vegetable markets of such sections as the Yakima Valley and Walla Walla. This can be done by friendly conferences with other nations as the President is proposing.

With an equitable distribution of the profits of production and an adjustment of the monetary and tariff systems throughout the world, thus restoring the $8,000,000,000 international trade we have lost in the past 5 years, the farmers will come into their own and secure their share of the good things in this land of boundless wealth and natural resources. They demand nothing more and will be satisfied with nothing less.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL] has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HART].

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I will vote for this bill, not because it is going to solve the refinancing problem of the farmer but because it is going to give him a breathing spell. I know, as an experienced farmer, that I cannot earn the interest rate provided in this bill; but if the refinancing is carried out, the farmer will have at least a year or a year and a half, in which time he may be able to get some better legislation. I shall therefore vote for the bill.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism to make of any Member of the House. In the days when I was a little more fiery I sometimes possibly impugned the motives of some Members, but I find every Member of the House, that I have come to know, is honestly and earnestly doing the best he can. Some of them are reared in a different atmosphere from others; some have a different viewpoint, but all are working largely to the same goal.

Mr. Chairman, regardless of the criticisms and groanings, this measure has a number of features that, in my judgment, will prove of real benefit. It will reduce all the mortgages in the United States, that come within its terms, from the present interest rates, ranging as high as 8 percent, averaging 6.1 percent down to not to exceed 4½ and maybe lower. The average length of time the farm mortgages of America run today is 5 years, that is, if the Federal land bank and joint-stock land bank mortgages are not included. All of the principal and interest of the average farm mortgage in America must be paid within 5 years, and that rate of interest averages 6.1 percent.

The document prepared by the Department of Agriculture and which is available to all the Members has this information as well as much other valuable data. In other words, the mortgages of the insurance companies, mortgage companies, and individuals have an average payment period of only 5 years. The long-term payments provided in the Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks bring this average for the total up to 8 years. The pending measure permits these mortgages to be refinanced over a period of not to exceed 40 years. If it works out as it is planned, it will mean a saving of interest rates to the American farmer of not merely millions but probably $2,000,000,000 when spread over the entire time that the mortgages will run.

I have great hopes of beneficial effects from the operations under title 3, which provides $300,000,000 for the purpose of financing through either first or second mortgages.

One feature of this title refers to personal or outside obligations. With this I will not deal at this time.

I am more interested in the feature of this title which was outlined to you by my colleague Mr. BUCHANAN, of Texas. To illustrate: Suppose there were a $5,000 mortgage against a farm, this mortgage being excessive. The representative of the Commissioner would say to the mortgage holder, "If you will reduce the face of the mortgage $1,000, the Government will then pay you an additional $1,000 in cash, reducing your first mortgage to $3,000, on condition that you extend the $3,000 first mortgage and carry it yourself over a long period of years at 4 percent interest or 3½ percent interest. The Government will then take a $1,000 second mortgage."

The result would then be as follows: The farmer, instead of having a $5,000 mortgage against his farm with delinquent payments and heavy payments coming on, would owe a $3,000 first mortgage at, say, 3½ percent, and a $1,000 second mortgage at 5 percent, both spread over a long period of years. The mortgage company, instead of a $5,000 doubtful mortgage, would have a good $3,000 mortgage with a low interest rate it is true, but with $1,000 in cash. These are arbitrary figures used for the purpose of illustration. The Government might be able, with a smaller cash payment and a smaller second mortgage, to induce such a scale down and thus operate in the interest of all parties. Three hundred million dollars used in this fashion would thus refinance several times that amount in mortgages.

During the discussion criticism has been leveled as to the rate of interest provided in the other terms of this bill. I wish the rates might be made lower. To do so, however, would probably mean the Government's actually refinancing most of the mortgages in America. This would not trouble me, as I believe that mortgages could be refinanced this way at a low rate of interest without any appreciable loss to the Government. This, however, is an individual opinion.

I have heretofore introduced a bill which would have accomplished this purpose. A great many other bills have been introduced. That is just the point. None of them has been passed.

During the last few years we have all known of the necessity of refinancing farm mortgages. While we have talked, nothing has been done. In spite of all these bills, in spite of all the conversation, the farmers are still paying an average interest rate of 6⅛ percent on mortgage loans. The average length of time farm mortgages run in America is 5 years. Thus the farmers of America are burdened with a debt that bears an average of 6⅛ percent interest, and the average mortgage is wholly due, principal and interest, within a period of 5 years. If these interest rates could be reduced to an average of not more than 4½ percent, with a possibility of their being less and refinanced over a long period of years, do you not think it would have a vast beneficial effect? I believe it would.

This is an administration measure. The administration is willing to do something. It is willing to take action. This measure has been carefully worked out—as carefully as any measure of this kind may well be fashioned. Here is a chance to secure action on a measure instead of continued talk.

We have heard talk about the Frazier bill. There are other bills of a similar nature; some of them go further than the Frazier bill; some of them are not quite so liberal. Many of them have been pending for a long period of time, but this is the bill that is before us. This is the bill on which there is a chance for action. In voting for this measure you are not voting against the Frazier bill; you are not voting against the Busby bill; you are not voting against the Cross bill or any other bill that may be pending or that may be offered. You are voting for this bill.

Any kind of a motion to recommit would probably mean further delay. You may favor a currency measure. Many Members of the House do favor such a measure; but if you undertake to complicate this measure with an admixture of other things, you are apt to reach the result of getting neither.

I believe some of these other measures should be adopted. I believe there should be an adjustment of the currency in such a way that it will be a true measure of value at all times. I believe this thoroughly. I believe that such a measure should be thoroughly thought out and wrought out. I do not believe we should go at such a measure blindly. When such a measure is presented, I want someone who has studied the question thoroughly to have a part in its preparation.

I am not interested in making it appear that I have done something. I want results. If it is necessary to operate on the almost lifeless form of American agriculture, I want the surgeon who wields the knife to be one who wishes the patient to live. I want him to be an expert. When we go into the delicate machinery of the issue of currency, which I want done, I want it done intelligently; I want it done effectively.

It is possible that the whole Federal Reserve System needs revamping. Our experience of the last few years should teach us something. The manipulations of a few financial racketeers like Mitchell and others should be guarded against in the new set-up. I want these men who have been perverting the financial system of America forced into the background. In the darkness of oblivion I want to hear the swish of their vanishing wings.

But this is not an easy matter. You cannot wish such a condition into being. Those who would take advantage of the finances of America are men of keen intelligence. If we are to take away from them the control of the finances of our country, if we are to wrest our Government from the group that has had too much control, we must match intelligence with intelligence. We must use the greatest care that it is possible for us to use. We must make it certain, insofar as it is humanly possible, that the same result cannot be brought about again and that the real interest of all Americans, including farmers, shall be protected.

I was not particularly interested in the handling of this bill. Being an administration measure in these days of emergency, it was set to pass. I made the open proposition to the chairman and others on the Committee on Banking and Currency that my committee would make no contention for this bill, provided that they would agree that the Committee on Agriculture would hereafter handle legislation affecting the new farm-credit administration. I was interested in the long-run problem—in the future of agriculture, in farm interest rates for the future. This is not the only measure in the long-range program which may inure to the benefit of American agriculture, and it is in the program ranging over the years that I am interested. Agriculture must be financed on the soundest basis possible over a long period of years. I have dreamed that such a program might be worked out so that the shackles might be broken from the farms and ranches of our land.

I want to see freight rates come down. I want to see trade barriers adjusted in the interest of markets. I want to see the discriminations against agriculture in our economic set-up removed. I want to see agriculture put on the same dead level of equality with other institutions and other commercial activities.

I am interested primarily in American agriculture. Practically all my people, as far back as I know anything about them, in Tennessee, in Virginia, and in South Carolina, have been tillers of the soil. Poor? Yes; poor as the rocks to which they clung and to which they sometimes felt themselves almost akin; yet, so far as I know anything about them, they have always been free in their actions and in their operations.

In the long range I do not want to increase credit, but to get as low a rate of interest as possible and finally endeavor to work the American farmer free from debt instead of increasing his debt. [Applause.] This is the hope I have, not the increasing of his debt but insofar as possible freeing him from debt. The operations of this bill will not increase his debt; it will reduce his interest rate. It will give him a longer time in which to make it possible for him to pay his debts and furnish him a method of financing that is far better than that under which he is now laboring.

In spite of the criticism, the threats, and the dire predictions, I believe in the United States Government, her history, her institutions, and her people. Knowing the glory of her past, I have implicit faith in her future.

This is but one of a series of steps that are being planned. I hope it will not be necessary to present rules like this in the future. In my 16 years of service this is the second time I have ever presented a measure which did not provide for freedom of amendment on the part of any Member of the House. I would not have presented it this time but for the great emergency and but for the desire for early action. After years of floundering, after years of contention, after many mistakes, after much discussion, we have reached the time for action.

We have at the other end of the Avenue a President. He is a Roosevelt and has the Roosevelt spirit. Many people are impatient because they do not get done just what they want done; but, let me remind you that he has been President only 6 weeks. I believe he has inspired more confidence and restored hope to a greater degree in the American people in a brief period than any other man I have ever known. I hope his future actions may justify a continuance of this confidence. He cannot do all the needful things all at one time. He has many important questions crowding for attention. He has the currency question, which is the most important of all questions and the one on which the success of all others depends. He has the foreign affairs question, the farm mortgage question, the home mortgage question, and an infinite variety of other problems. In the early hours of the morning, through the day, and far into the night he has been working, toiling, struggling to solve these tremendous problems and bring about better conditions in America.

We are giving him broad powers. I have faith in him. I know that he is trying. Insofar as it is possible, I want him to have an unhindered opportunity to carry out a program of reconstruction. He should have an opportunity by trial and error and otherwise to determine just what, in each instance, is the best course to pursue.

Let us not break the circle. Let us not hinder the program by a process of sniping. For years we have been groping around talking about various bills. He has started out to do something. Let us give him an opportunity to do it. If he goes too far, the Congress has at any time the power to checkmate him. It has the jurisdiction to withdraw any authority. It has the power to stop the program at any time it may go awry.

I have just been furnished by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the rates now charged in making their loans. They are charging the banks 5 percent, the insurance companies 5 percent, the mortgage companies 5 percent, and the railroads 5½ percent. Thus all this talk about reducing the rate of interest in line with the rates of interest charged others is not well considered.

This measure provides an interest rate not to exceed 4½ percent. I hope it may be possible to apply a lesser rate. The measure provides a lesser rate shall be stipulated where it is possible to do so. One feature of the bill to which I referred a moment ago makes it possible to secure a much smaller rate in many instances. Let us be fair in our comparisons.

Mr. Chairman, in order to make sure that these $300,000,000, or any part of it as provided in title 3, may be used for longer range financing of farm indebtedness, the committee has agreed upon an amendment which I now offer.

The CHAIRMAN. All time having expired, the gentleman from Texas is recognized to present a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 18, line 2, after the word "years", insert a comma and the following: "Or, in the case of a first or second mortgage secured wholly by real property and made for the purpose of reducing and refinancing an existing mortgage within an agreed period no greater than that for which loans may be made under the Federal Farm Loan Act as amended."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, we should like very much to have some explanation of the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I will make this explanation: Under title 3 of the bill provision is made whereby $300,000,000 may be available for first or second mortgages. This applies to different kinds of indebtedness, but one of the main purposes is to enable them to make trades with the mortgagees to reduce the principal and interest. In some cases these individuals or mortgage companies may need a little cash and would be willing to have their first mortgage reduced, both principal and interest, and spread the balance of the loan over a longer period of years. This amendment enables the administrator to make the second loan for a longer period than 10 years on the land mortgages of this character.

Mr. DOWELL. Would such loans be made at the same rate of interest?

Mr. JONES. No; the second liens will bear 5 percent interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ARNOLD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4795) to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to refinance farm mortgages at lower rates of interest, to amend and supplement the Federal Farm Loan Act, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes, pursuant to the resolution (H.Res. 103), he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BOILEAU. I am.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman a member of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. BOILEAU. I am.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman care to have the motion read?

Mr. BOILEAU. If I may have half a moment to explain what I have offered, I shall not insist upon the reading of the motion.

Mr. JONES. It is what has been referred to here as the Frazier bill, is it not?

Mr. BOILEAU. It is the Frazier bill providing for refinancing at 1½ percent interest and provides for a bond issue, and so forth.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion may be printed in the RECORD and considered as read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The motion is as follows:

Mr. BOILEAU moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture, with instructions to that committee to report it back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"'That this act shall be known by the title "The Farmers' Farm Relief Act."

"'SEC. 2. That the Government now perform its solemn promise and duty and place American agriculture on a basis of equality with other industries by providing an adequate system of credit, through which farm indebtedness and farm mortgages now existing may be liquidated and refinanced, through real-estate mortgages on the amortization plan, at 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent principal per annum, and through mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes at 3 percent interest per annum through the use of the machinery of the Federal farm-loan system and the Federal Reserve Banking System.

"'SEC. 3. The Farm Loan Commissioner is hereby authorized and directed to liquidate, refinance, and take up farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness, existing at the date of enactment of this act, by making real-estate loans, secured by first mortgages on farms, to an amount equal to the fair value of such farms and 50 percent of the value of insurable buildings and improvements thereon, through the use of the machinery of the Federal land banks and national farm-loan associations, and to make all necessary rules and regulations for the carrying out of the purposes of this act with expedition. In case such farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness to be liquidated and refinanced exceeds the fair value of any farm and 50 percent of the value of insurable buildings and improvements thereon, then such farm mortgages and indebtedness shall be scaled down in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto. Such loans shall be made at a rate of 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent principal per annum, payable in any lawful money of the United States.

"'SEC. 4. The Farm Loan Commissioner is further authorized and directed to liquidate, refinance, and take up chattel mortgages and other farm indebtedness, existing at the date of enactment of this act, by making loans at the rate of 3 percent interest per annum, secured by first mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes, to an amount equal to 65 percent of the fair market value thereof, such loans to run for a period of 1 year, with right of renewal from year to year for a term of 10 years: Provided, That any depreciation in the value of such livestock is replaced by additional livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes and the amount of the loan is reduced 10 percent each year.

"'SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, $100,000 for the use of the Farm Loan Commissioner to carry out the provisions of this act. The necessary and actual expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be apportioned and prorated and added to each individual mortgage, and such sums so added shall be paid to the Farm Loan Commissioner for administrative purposes.

"'SEC. 6. The funds with which to liquidate and refinance existing farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness shall be provided by the issuing of farm-loan bonds by the Federal farm loan system, through the Farm Loan Commissioner and Federal land banks, as now provided by law, which bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 1½ percent per annum, if secured by mortgages on farms, and 3 percent per annum if secured by chattel mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes. These bonds, after delivery to the Farm Loan Commissioner, may by him be sold at par to any individual or corporation, or to any State, National, or Federal Reserve bank, or to the Treasurer of the United States. And it shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve banks to invest their available surplus and net profits, after the dividends are paid to their stockholders, in such farm-loan bonds, such profits to include the franchise tax now paid to the United States.

"'SEC. 7. In case all of said farm-loan bonds are not readily purchased, then the Farm Loan Commissioner shall present the remainder to the Federal Reserve Board, and the Board shall forthwith cause to be issued and delivered to the Farm Loan Commissioner Federal Reserve notes to an amount equal to the par value of such bonds as are presented to it, such farm-loan bonds to be held by the Federal Reserve Board as security in lieu of any other security or reserve.

"'SEC. 8. The Farm Loan Commissioner and the Federal Land banks shall turn over all payments of interest and principal on such farm-loan bonds, for which the Federal Reserve Board issues Federal Reserve notes, to the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be by him kept for the purpose of redeeming said Federal Reserve notes and reinvested by him as a sinking fund in municipal or State bonds and bearing interest at the rate of at least 2 percent per annum, both principal and interest to be paid in any lawful money of the United States.

"'SEC. 9. Whenever the amount of money actually in circulation in the United States shall exceed $75 per capita, then the Treasurer of the United States, by and with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board and the President of the United States, may retire Federal Reserve notes in an amount equal to the principal paid on farm-loan bonds, for which Federal Reserve notes were issued, not to exceed 2 percent in any 1 year, of the amount of Federal Reserve notes so issued.

"'SEC. 10. There is hereby created a Board of Agriculture consisting of one member from each State, elected by the farmers of such State, who shall be elected by delegates selected by a mass convention of farmers in each county or parish within the United States, who are indebted and declare it to be their intention to take advantage of this act, such county or parish convention to be its own judge as to who are bona fide farmers and otherwise eligible to participate in its proceedings.

"'SEC. 11. The Farm Loan Commissioner is hereby authorized and directed to give public notice, through the Federal land banks, to the farmers of each county or parish of the time and place of holding the first county or parish convention, which shall be held at the seat of government of each county or parish; and it shall at the same time give notice of the first convention of the State delegates, to be held at the State capital of each State, notice of such convention to be given within 60 days after the enactment of this act.

"'SEC. 12. The farmers attending such county or parish convention and the State delegates attending such State convention shall organize and make such rules and regulations for their procedure as they deem necessary or convenient, and shall elect a president and a secretary and make arrangements for such other and future conventions as they may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, and they shall at all times cooperate and assist the Board of Agriculture, the Farm Loan Commissioner, the Federal land banks, the national farm-loan associations to liquidate and refinance farm mortgages and farm indebtedness.

"'SEC. 13. The State delegates so elected shall meet at the State capitals of their respective States and elect a member of the Board of Agriculture, who shall hold his office from the date of such election and for a period of 2 years from January 20 following, and who shall receive $15 per diem and necessary traveling expenses while on official business, to be paid by the Farm Loan Commissioner out of any funds set apart by section 5 of this act.

"'SEC. 14. Immediately after their election the members of the Board of Agriculture, upon call of the Farm Loan Commissioner, shall meet at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and organize by electing a chairman and a secretary, and they shall make such rules and regulations as they deem necessary and expedient to carry out the purposes of this act. They shall elect an executive committee of three, none of whom shall be members of the Board of Agriculture, who shall hold their office at the will of said Board, and who shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum, and 5 cents per mile for necessary traveling expenses while on official business, to be paid by the Farm Loan Commissioner out of any funds set apart by section 5 of this act.

"'SEC. 15. The members of the Board of Agriculture shall keep in touch with and report to the executive committee the progress of liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and farm indebtedness in their respective States. They shall cooperate with county or parish and State governments, and with all farm and cooperative organizations within their respective States, to speedily bring about the liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness.

"'SEC. 16. The executive committee of the Board of Agriculture shall advise with and supervise the work of liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and farm indebtedness by the Farm Loan Commissioner and the Federal Reserve Board, and they shall cooperate with said boards and with county or parish and State governments and with the various farm organizations, and with the agricultural colleges of the Nation, in order to bring about a just and speedy liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness. They shall report any member of the farm-loan system or the Federal Reserve Board who neglects, hinders, or delays the carrying out of the provisions of this act to the President of the United States, and it shall be the duty of the President, upon cause shown, to remove any such officer and to appoint some other suitable person in his place with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"'SEC. 17. The benefits of this act shall also extend to any farmer, or member of his family, who lost his farm through indebtness or mortgage foreclosure since 1919, and who desires to purchase the farm lost or another farm. It shall also extend to any tenant, or member of his family, who desires to purchase a farm, provided he has lived on and operated a farm as a tenant for at least 3 years prior to the enactment of this act.

"'SEC. 18. The executive committee of the Board of Agriculture shall have power in case of crop failures, and in other meritorious cases, to extend the time payments due on loans made under this act from time to time for a period not exceeding 3 years, provided the mortgagor keeps up the payments of all taxes on the mortgaged property.

"'SEC. 19. This act shall be liberally construed, and no technicalities or limitations shall be imposed or permitted to interfere with the speedy carrying out of its purposes; and the provisions of the Federal farm-loan system and the Federal Reserve banking system shall apply as far as applicable in the carrying out of the provisions of this act; and all laws or parts of laws in conflict herewith are for the purpose of this act repealed. The persons charged with the duty of carrying out the provisions of this act are authorized and directed to do all things necessary or convenient to accomplish its purposes with expedition.'"

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that my obligation requires me to make a point of order against this amendment on the ground it is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment there can be no question that this motion is not germane to the measure before the House. True, they both provide for refinancing of farm mortgages, but the Chair, of course, is familiar with the rule that in order to be germane all features of an amendment must be germane.

If the Chair will turn to sections 7, 8, and 9 of the pending motion, he will find that it provides for an issue of currency, a limitation on such issue, and control of the amount of money that may be effected by this issue.

The pending bill provides for loans for the joint-stock land banks with interest guaranteed by the Government, for the sale of them, and raising money in the regular way.

It does not provide for any issue of currency nor for the expansion of currency. It does not provide for any of those features.

I call attention to two or three instances with which I am familiar. I have before me a bill offered by the present occupant of the chair back in 1924, when the original McNary-Haugen bill was before the House—both of them farm bills.

The Speaker, in my judgment, offered a bill better than the then pending bill. He presented it as a substitute, and it followed the lines of the pending bill on the question of raising prices of farm products and the question of organization, but it finally departed on the question of using export and import certificates as a method of handling the surplus rather than the equalization fee.

The Chair ruled that it was not germane to the pending bill. The Chair said:

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois as a substitute for the entire bill is more nearly germane than the former amendment, but the Chair is of opinion that it does not come within the rule of germaneness. The object sought, of course, is farm relief, but that does not necessarily make the bill germane. The method is so entirely different in the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois from the method under consideration that it seems to the Chair that it is not germane. Both bills recognize that the question of price is determined somewhat upon the exportable surplus, but the bill, which the Chair has rather hastily read, offered by the gentleman from Illinois by way of substitute proposes to deal with this question of exportable surplus by giving a bounty to the exporter, evidently with the view that if the export brings a fair price, a fair price would result in the domestic market; but that is such a departure from the plan of the bill, which creates a Government corporation, giving it power and authority to export, that it would not come within the rules of the House to hold it germane. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Then, I recall in 1926 I was interested in the debenture plan of farm relief, and the McNary-Haugen bill again came up. I offered an amendment to strike out certain sections and insert new matter, and it was held that that was out of order.

The next year, I think it was, in an effort to get my proposition voted on, I took the pending bill, spent about 3 days writing all the provisions of the pending bill into the clocklike work of my bill in such a way that I thought the Chair would not be able to distinguish between them.

I used the same sort of organization, the same officials, the same procedure, the same method of application, in an effort to bring the case within the rule.

The Chair again ruled, on April 25, 1929, that a similar proposal to a similar bill was not germane.

I was somewhat peeved when that ruling was made. But after I thought of it I realized the wisdom of having a measure that had received consideration before being finally enacted into law. If you once open the sluicegates, you will have a measure with all kinds of questions and variety of amendments attached to it. It is in the interest of orderly procedure that measures may be presented in a clean-cut fashion with a direct issue. With some of the features of this amendment I am in hearty accord, and I think they should be considered thoroughly by a proper committee.

I want to quote from a parliamentary decision that has long been treated as a landmark in this House. It was quoted in the decision on a similar question on April 25, 1929:

Simply because an amendment seeks to solve the same problem as that sought to be solved by the pending bill does not make the amendment germane.

The purpose of the rule of germaneness is to prevent the consideration of legislation which has not been considered in committee, and therefore the rule may be applied more strictly to a long amendment by way of a substitute for the entire bill under consideration.

The rules of the House are based on reason. They are based on human experience. They are the results of years of effort on the part of legislative bodies to attain rules and precedents that will best promote carefully thought out and effective legislation.

The features embodied in the proposed substitute can be presented in a proper way, presented to the proper committee for study. And they certainly need study. Therefore there is reason behind this procedure. Mr. Speaker, it is so clearly not germane that I do not care to discuss the matter further.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] made a very persuasive argument upon the principle that two subjects are not necessarily germane because they are related, but that is not the provision under which I believe the Chair must necessarily form his opinion upon the motion to recommit. I believe this comes clearly under the principle that a general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class. There are a large number of decisions and precedents that provide that when a bill contains two or more subject matters or methods of performing a certain action, when there is more than one method provided to accomplish a purpose or when there are two or more related subjects in the same bill, a motion is in order and is germane that amends either by adding related subject or by moving to strike out all of the bill and include therein a separate or third method relating to the same general subject.

When a bill was before the House admitting several Territories into the Union, the Chair ruled that an amendment to admit another Territory was a germane amendment, but when a bill was before the House admitting only one Territory it was held not germane to include another Territory, the theory being that when there are two or more related subjects dealt with in the same bill a third provision may be embodied. I submit that this bill does contain more than one method of refinancing farm indebtedness, and I ask the Chair particularly to bear in mind the provisions of title I of the bill. Title I provides for the refinancing of farm mortgages. The substitute that I am offering also provides for refinancing of farm mortgages. Title I of the bill provides for refinancing through the issuance of bonds at 4 percent. That is one method that is used in this bill for the purpose of raising money or providing money for refinancing farm mortgages.

Title III gives a separate and distinct and entirely different method of affording relief to agriculture through refinancing. It provides that $300,000,000 shall be available through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, not through a bond issue, but from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, this money to be loaned for the purpose of refinancing farm indebtedness. Therefore, there are at least two methods—these two are the outstanding examples—in title I and title III of providing money to refinance farm indebtedness. The Frazier bill, which is now pending before the Committee on Agriculture in the form of the Lemke bill, companion to the Frazier bill introduced in the Senate, provides for refinancing of farm indebtedness—nothing more or less. It provides a bond issue the same as the bill before us provides in title I. It goes farther in one direction. Title III of the bill before us does not provide for a bond issue. It provides that the money shall be loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Frazier bill is a related subject, which provides a separate and distinct method, it is true, but in view of the fact that the bill before the House now has two separate and distinct methods of refinancing farm indebtedness, I maintain that the amendment I have offered is germane, because it comes within the provisions of the rule that provides that a general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class. I submit my amendment is in order, that it is germane, that it is as closely related to title I of the bill as is title III of the bill. There are already in the bill at least two distinct and different methods of refinancing farm mortgages, and therefore a third method is germane and is in order so long as it relates to the same subject matter.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard briefly on the proposition. It seems to me in approaching a proposition of this kind we must not take into consideration whether we are for or against the individual piece of legislation being considered. My position has always been to maintain the precedents and the rules of the House, regardless of my feelings toward the legislation under consideration. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin has not entirely comprehended the real point at issue when he refers to the precedents cited by him in his argument. I agree that if you have a piece of legislation amending the general provisions of a bill, that another amendment of similar character would be germane. As to the precedent that he refers to admitting two Territories, you could add another; but those two things are entirely different from what we have before us at the present time. There is no question but that adding an amendment admitting a third Territory would be germane, but the gentleman has lost the real point at issue in this discussion. The bill before us deals specifically with refinancing farm mortgages. That is the only definite proposition dealt with in the bill. You may issue them in one way or the other, but that is the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. May I suggest that in title III of the bill there is no bond issue but that the money is provided to come from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. SNELL. That is true, but it all has to do with the question of refinancing farm mortgages, and comes about by issuing bonds.

Mr. BOILEAU. So does the Frazier bill.

Mr. SNELL. The Frazier bill not only does all of that but in addition to this it provides for the direct issuance of currency. The question of currency is not mentioned in the present bill, and no reference is made to it whatever.

This bill before us relates entirely in all of its objects and purposes to the refinancing of farm-mortgage loans.

Whereas the proposed amendment embodying provisions to the so-called "Frazier bill" goes far beyond the purpose of the pending bill and relates not only to refinancing farm-mortgage loans at a lower rate of interest but provides also for a controlled expansion of the currency by the issuance of Federal farm-loan bonds, which bonds, if they cannot be readily sold shall be turned over to the Federal Reserve Board, which Board shall deliver to the Federal Farm Loan Board Federal Reserve notes equal to the par value of such bonds as are presented to it.

Now the pending bill has nothing whatever to do with the currency and nothing whatever to do with the Federal Reserve Board. It is strictly a refinancing proposition of farm mortgages through the Federal land bank system. Moreover, the proposed amendment deals in large part with a subject which is not within the jurisdiction of the committee which reported the pending bill, but is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and presents a subject wholly unrelated and irrelevant to the bill under consideration.

To a bill relating to the coinage of silver in the Treasury and its use in redemption of notes issued against it, amendments authorizing the issue of bonds and also authorizing the giving of notes for the deposits of silver were held not to be germane.

These decisions were rendered by Speaker Charles F. Crisp. Hinds' Presedents, volume 5, section 5886.

There is no doubt whatever in my mind but the Frazier bill interjects into this bill an entirely new and not germane subject and the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, may I make one further statement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. I should like to say that this problem presents three methods of refinancing farm mortgages: First, by bond issue; second, by loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; and, third, by the issuance of bonds and subsequent issuance of currency. Those are three distinct methods. Two of them are already provided for in the bill, and I maintain the third is germane and should be admitted. As far as the Committee on Agriculture not having jurisdiction is concerned, I wish to say that an identical bill, known as the Lemke bill, H.R. 2855, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and is now pending before that committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a brief point with respect to this point of order.

The bill under consideration has for its sole purpose the refinancing of farm mortgages, and provides money with which to do this refinancing, from bond issues of the Federal land banks and from either stock sales or bond issues of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, both of them private corporations. This method of financing is complete and adequate for the purpose of the original bill. The proposition under consideration by the motion to recommit is to expand the currency by 3½ billion dollars, which is not at all essential to the purpose of the bill, is not necessary for it. As anybody who understands the situation knows, and we all take judicial notice of the fact, it has a primary purpose entirely dissociated from mortgage redemptions. It is not necessary. It is an entirely new matter, and whether express or implied, it has a purpose foreign to the purposes of the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The question presented has been passed upon two or three times and presents nothing new. The bill under consideration provides a method of farm relief, essentially by the issuance of bonds, to be marketed in the ordinary way. The Frazier bill, which is the subject of the motion to recommit, provides also for farm relief, also for bond issues, and, in addition to that, provides a method of meeting the bond issues by currency printed and issued, clearly inflation, which may amount to as much as 3½ billion dollars. The two methods are as wide apart as the poles.

The present Speaker of the House argued a like question back in 1924 when the very first farm relief bill was under consideration, the first of the McNary-Haugen bills. That bill provided a method of farm relief, fixing farm prices with reference to related products, and the present Speaker of the House proposed an amendment to the bill which provided an entirely different method, and the present Speaker agrees with the gentleman from Texas when he said that his method was much better than the method provided in that bill; but that did not make any difference. A point of order was made against the amendment proposed by the present Speaker, by Mr. CANNON of Missouri, the author of Cannon's Precedents, and the gentleman from Missouri argued the point of order and convinced the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, Mr. SANDERS, although he did not convince me then, that my amendment was not germane. The object of my amendment then and the object of the bill under consideration at that time were to provide methods of farm relief, but they were widely different, although not as widely different as is proposed in the so-called "Frazier bill" and in the bill now under consideration.

Again, on April 24, 1929, the same question came up.

The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole at that time was Mr. MAPES. He rendered a decision based upon the decision rendered by Mr. SANDERS in 1924. The opinion by Mr. Chairman MAPES was a well-considered opinion covering the entire subject.

The Chair feels he cannot ignore the precedents that he has cited, and he might add that he could call attention to a number of others. The Chair wants it distinctly understood that he is not passing upon the propriety of inflating the currency. That is another question. If the currency is to be inflated by printing and distributing money in any way, it should be the subject of a separate bill, considered by a committee, reported to the House, and considered on the floor in the ordinary way.

The Chair, therefore, feels constrained to and does sustain the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the Membership, will not the Speaker incorporate in his present decision the 1924 opinion of Mr. SANDERS?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the opinion referred to will be printed.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] as a substitute for the entire bill is more nearly germane than the former amendment, but the Chair is of opinion that it does not come within the rule of germaneness. The object sought, of course, is farm relief, but that does not necessarily make the bill germane. The method is so entirely different in the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois from the method of the bill under consideration that it seems to the Chair that it is not germane. Both bills recognize that the question of price is determined somewhat upon the exportable surplus, but the bill which the Chair has rather hastily read, offered by the gentleman from Illinois by way of substitute, proposes to deal with this question of exportable surplus by giving a bounty to the exporter, evidently with the view that if the export brings a fair price, a fair price would result in the domestic market; but that is such a departure from the plan of the bill which creates a Government corporation, giving it power and authority to export, that it would not come within the rules of the House to hold it germane. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS] seeks to effect the same general purpose as the bill in question—that is, to relieve the agricultural situation. It is true, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], that the mere fact that there is to an extent a departure from the bill under consideration does not make it out of order because otherwise there would be no necessity of offering a substitute or amendment of any kind. However, it is not possible to offer a substitute for a bill which undertakes to give the same relief and yet departs entirely from the method of the bill under consideration. The Haugen bill, under consideration, is an emergency measure and merely gives power to investigate and determine when a special emergency exists with reference to any one of the enumerated agricultural products, and then the corporation having certain definite powers comes into action and by means of control of exportable surplus relieves the situation. This substitute is permanent legislation, giving the Government power to buy and sell farm products. While the ultimate object is to relieve agriculture, it embraces a method that does not come within the rules of the House in reference to germaneness to the bill under consideration, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I am not opposed to the bill, but I believe it ought to be amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GILCHRIST moves to recommit H.R. 4795 to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to amend the bill by striking therefrom the words "4 per centum" wherever such words appear in title I of the bill and by substituting in lieu thereof the words "3½ per centum"; and also by striking the words "5 per centum" wherever such words appear in such title and by substituting in lieu thereof the words "4¼ per centum"; and by striking "4½ per centum" in line 12 of section 4 of the bill, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "3½ per centum."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GILCHRIST) there were—ayes 43, noes, 196.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Is a request for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is in order; yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 387, nays 12, not voting 32, as follows:

Mr. Gibson (for) with Mr. Andrew of Mass. (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. Gifford with Mr. Simpson.

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. WEARIN, is unavoidably absent. If he were here, he would vote "aye."

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GIFFORD, is ill. If present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the following Members are unavoidably absent. If they had been present, they would have voted "aye."

Mr. HIGGINS, Mr. BUCKBEE, Mr. REID of Illinois, Mr. BRUMM, Mr. CONNOLLY, Mr. HOLLISTER, Mr. MOYNIHAN, and Mr. MULDOWNEY.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the following Members are unavoidably absent. If they had been present, they would have voted "aye" on the bill.

Mr. DOUGLASS, Mr. FERNANDEZ, Mr. KEE, Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. ALMON, Mr. BRENNAN, Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. FARLEY, Mr. MONTAGUE, Mr. CARTWRIGHT, Mr. BRAND, Mr. KERR, Mr. BEAM, Mr. STEAGALL, Mr. WEARIN, and Mr. WHITE.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. How does the distinguished majority leader know that these gentlemen would have voted as he states?

Mr. BYRNS. For the same reason that the distinguished whip on the gentleman's side knew how the Members he mentioned would have voted. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. JONES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEVING THE FARM RELIEVERS

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a short address delivered by myself over the National Broadcasting System on the farm bill which recently passed the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by myself over the network of the National Broadcasting Co., April 8, 1933:

The title of this address should leave no doubt in the minds of this audience as to those who, in my judgment, are going to be relieved by the pending farm relief bill. This bill was sponsored by the American Farm Bureau Federation and the National Grange, and by three large cooperative organizations who borrowed huge sums of money, which came out of the Federal Treasury as the result of the Farm Marketing Act.

The situation of the farmers of the United States would be bad enough because of the diversity of their interests, due to geographical, climatic, and soil conditions, if they had no organization at all. However, when you realize that these so-called "farm leaders" have capitalized the sad plight of the farmers to raid the Treasury and pay themselves enormous salaries, you can see that their situation is indeed tragic.

Why should the salaries of farm relievers be so high? Why should these men, with crocodile tears in their eyes, telling about the grievous predicament of the farmer, demand salaries from $10,000 to $75,000 a year? They have a 100-percent record for backing farm legislation that has failed. Under their leadership the farmer has sunk to the lowest point since the first settlers landed in Virginia under John Smith.

With a record of this kind of leadership, why should anyone have faith in further legislation which they advocate? They claim to represent at least half the farmers of the United States. Consult your farmer friends in your own community and you will find out that these claims are false. Yet these statements are freely made and kept before the Congress, and Congress is passing legislation that they are demanding. Congress has but few men who have had any experience in farm marketing. Therefore it is comparatively easy for these pirates to raid the Treasury with their unsound schemes.

I am going to discuss the American Farm Bureau Federation in particular, because this is the most active so-called "farm lobby" here in Washington. These leaders, and especially the American Farm Bureau Federation, have been active with reference to all legislation since 1920. They have been instrumental in the passage of farm legislation, and the farmers' condition has grown steadily worse. Mr. Chester H. Gray, Washington representative of this organization, testifying February 20, 1930, before the Caraway lobby-investigation hearing in the Seventy-first Congress, stated that every member of the Federal Farm Board was satisfactory to them. Mr. Gray also stated his organization was responsible for the naming of Alexander Legge, head of the farm machinery trust, as Chairman of the Federal Farm Board. Therefore, according to their own testimony, the American Farm Bureau Federation directed the handling of the Federal Farm Board with its policy of permitting farm leaders to draw salaries of fifty and seventy-five thousand dollars a year. These high-priced farm relievers, according to the last statement of the Federal Farm Board, have lost $350,000,000 of the taxpayers' money. I want to ask the farmers of the United States if they want another scheme sponsored by the same people, which cost the Treasury $350,000,000 and the farmers untold millions.

Did these farm organizations sincerely believe that the Farm Marketing Act would be beneficial to the farmer? If they did, they disclosed their ignorance of farm economics. If they did not, they disclosed their willingness to offer this quack remedy to deceive the farmer.

To help you decide as to their sincerity I want to call your attention to the testimony of Mr. Chester H. Gray, Washington representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation, in the hearings before the Caraway lobby committee of the Senate, showing the connection between Mr. Gray and Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and their dealings with the Nitrogen Trust, the Power Trust, the placing on the pay roll of either the Union Carbide or American Cyanamid Co. Farm Bureau agents for the purpose of defeating Senator NORRIS' Muscle Shoals bill, which would have given cheap nitrogen to the farmers.

Now, let us take up the pending bill. It has been endorsed by Mr. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation; L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange; C. E. Huff, president Farmers' National Grain Corporation; C. G. Henry, representing the American Cotton Cooperative Association; and Charles E. Ewing, president of the National Livestock Marketing Association.

First, let us see how all these gentlemen profited from the last farm bill, as compared with the farmer. Mr. O'Neal's concern had two of their former officers drawing $12,000 a year as members of the Federal Farm Board—namely, Mr. Sam H. Thompson, former president, and Mr. Frank Evans, former secretary. Mr. C. E. Huff is the preacher who draws $15,000 a year as president of the Farmers' National Grain Corporation. This is the concern that was organized under the trust laws of Delaware with a paid capital of $76,000, and just before election refunded their loan of $16,000,000 from the Federal Farm Board for 10 years at one eighth of 1 per cent interest. They could buy Government bonds with the Government's own money and make a profit of $500,000 a year. Mr. Huff should be interested in some more farm legislation of this kind, since the Farm Board is going out of existence.

Mr. C. G. Henry, of the American Cotton Cooperative Association, who also endorsed the present bill, represents a concern with a paid capital of $79,500 which now owes the Government, through the Federal Farm Board, $61,000,000 that was lost speculating in cotton. Charles E. Ewing, president of the National Livestock Marketing Association, should also be interested. His concern also has a loan of many millions from the Farm Board.

In the light of the record of these men, would you as farmers call them in to chart your course? Would a business man or a banker place these men upon their board of directors after their record with the Federal Farm Board? Yet, these are the gentlemen who claim to have written the pending bill and agreed upon it on behalf of the farmers of the United States.

I, as one farmer, enter a loud protest, and I want to thank the National Broadcasting Co. for permitting me to make it loud enough so it will be heard from coast to coast.

Having given you a history of the gentlemen who claim to represent the farmers, now let us discuss the bill as it has been presented to the Senate (H.R. 3835) with Senate amendments. The first provision in this bill for relief of the farmer is a huge speculation in cotton. This, of course, is the chief interest of the American Cotton Cooperative Association. It is evident that the American Cotton Cooperative, which Mr. Henry represents, expects in this deal to save something from the wreck of that concern, which owes the Government $61,000,000, that are admittedly lost. The impression has been given out that this money was lost stabilizing cotton. The Farm Marketing Act never provided for cooperatives to stabilize any commodity, and the contract under which the money was lost expressly provided otherwise. The stabilization organizations, both in grain and cotton, were to carry out that work. If this bill is passed time will tell whether or not Mr. Henry's concern will come out of this deal with a few million dollars to the good. This concern should be placed in the hands of a receiver, and the cotton which they have should be liquidated and every dollar in this organization should be turned back into the Treasury without any negotiations whatever. The concern owes millions they can never hope to pay, and it is all the taxpayers' money. Here is the language in this new bill that provides the way out for Mr. Henry's concern: "In making such settlements the cotton shall be taken over at prices equal to the amounts loaned or advanced, directly or indirectly, plus the carrying charges and operating costs thereon."

These operating costs for 1930–31, which the Government is to take over, include the $75,000 salary of Mr. Creekmore; the $15,000 salary of Mr. C. O. Moser, their chief lobbyist; Mr. C. C. Henry's salary of $10,000; Mr. U. Benton Blalock's salary of $10,000 per year; Homer T. Wade's salary of some $5,000 per year; and like salaries of numerous other officials of that organization. Is it any wonder that these gentlemen are enthusiastically for the bill, or that they have spent most of the time since Congress met in Washington at the taxpayers' expense?

Mr. Henry's concern, the American Cotton Cooperative, has undoubtedly handled several millions of bales of cotton on which a profit was made. What has become of the profits? The bill provides that the Government shall assume the losses. It is presumed that the farm "relievers" will take the profits. If this is carried out, Teapot Dome was a mild swindle. This bill, under section 9, page 10, provides for the levying and collecting of taxes which are to be paid out for rental and other benefit payments to the farmers after deducting all expenses. How much will be left for the farmer no man can tell. However, all commodities named in the bill are subject to a processors' tax which may run as high as 50 or 100 percent. Section 16 provides that a tax shall be levied upon the floor stocks of processed goods on hand. Under section 19, subsection C, it provides that in order that the payment of the tax under this act may not impose any immediate financial burden upon the processors and distributors they shall be eligible for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under section 5 of that act.

Now let us see what can happen with reference to the money borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In the hearing before the Senate Agricultural Committee, Mr. Woods, representing the meat-packing industry, told the committee that in his judgment this tax could not be passed on to the consumer without curtailing the consumption of meat. He stated that the housewife would only spend just so much of her income for meat, and any increase in price cut the amount of meat she would buy. He also stated that meat is perishable and must be sold by the packers regardless of profit or loss. Mr. Woods also stated that the packing industry was not making a profit and that their normal profits when business is good run from one fourth to one sixth of a cent a pound. It is obvious, therefore, that the packer cannot assume any losses due to this act. Mr. Woods further testified that it would take $30,000,000 to pay the tax on the packers' stocks and $50,000,000 would be needed a little later to finance the tax. If the theory of the meat packers is correct, that this tax cannot be passed on to the consumer, or that meat is perishable and must be sold regardless of profit or loss, as Mr. Woods testified, and the packers lose the $80,000,000 in the operation, what position would the Government be in? Would the packers assume this loss, or would they come to Congress and ask us to cancel it as we will have to do for the American Cotton Cooperative? These loans are available to all processors under the law and would apply to the meat-packing industry, to the cotton mills, to the rice mills, flour mills, and all other industries operating under this act.

It is, therefore, conceivable that instead of the farmers getting relief that the Treasury of the United States may be relieved of half a billion dollars. The processors are not in sympathy with this act and it is my judgment that if this money is lost that inasmuch as they were forced into this kind of an operation by law, that the Government never could recover the funds. I want to ask the farmers of the United States if this is the kind of legislation they want? I want to ask the farmers if the American Farm Bureau Federation represents their views in sponsoring this legislation? Does the National Grange represent your views in this legislation? Does the American Cotton Cooperative, which has lost $61,000,000 of the taxpayers' money, represent your views? Does Mr. Huff's Farmers National Grain Organization, who has 16 millions of the taxpayers' money to play with for 10 years, paying one eighth of 1 percent, represent your views?

If these men represent your views, I wish you would write to the President and tell him so. If they do not represent your views, I wish you would write the President and tell him specifically your connection with farm organizations and whether or not any of these I have enumerated represent your viewpoint. He is your friend, I assure you. No man has ever desired to assist the farmer as our President now desires to help you. In my judgment, and I have had 30 years' experience in farming and in the marketing of farm produce, this is a farm relievers' and processors' bill from which the farmer will derive little or no benefit. It has been recommended to the President by the leaders of farm organizations as a farmers' bill. I am making this plea to you because I am firmly convinced that you are not represented in Washington, but that you are misrepresented.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS AND MUNITIONS OF WAR

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution, H.Res. 101, which is on the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 101

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration of H.J.Res. 93, a joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States under certain conditions, and all points of order against said bill shall be considered as waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to me to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question?

Mr. POU. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to ask the majority leader about the program for this afternoon and tomorrow. A great many of our Members are very anxious to attend church on Good Friday.

Mr. BYRNS. I certainly do not want to keep anybody from attending church, and I may say that the time allowed under this rule will take the consideration of this bill over until tomorrow unless the House is willing to stay here late in the evening.

I have conferred with the gentleman from New York in regard to the matter and, so far as I am concerned, with the consent of the House, I am perfectly willing to sit for a reasonable time this afternoon, if the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the members of the committee so desire, and then conclude the debate tomorrow and take the matter up to the point of ordering the previous question and have the vote, if a record vote is to be taken, on next Monday.

Mr. SNELL. So far as I know, that is entirely satisfactory to this side of the House.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is perfectly satisfactory on this side.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, could we have an understanding with the gentleman from Tennessee that there will be no other business called up during this week?

Mr. BYRNS. I know of no other business.

Mr. BLANTON. There will be no other rules or resolutions that are on the calendar called up?

Mr. BYRNS. Not that I have any knowledge of.

Mr. SNELL. That is the way I understood the situation.

Mr. BLANTON. So that not only on Good Friday but on Thursday may Members go somewhere, if they desire.

Mr. SNELL. It is a little late for Thursday.

Mr. HASTINGS. Something may come over from the Senate in the meantime.

Mr. BYRNS. I take it the gentleman's suggestion did not include any report from the Senate, or anything of that kind.

Mr. BLANTON. I referred to matters now on the calendar or on the Speaker's table.

Mr. KNUTSON. I should like to ask the distinguished majority leader if there are any more gag rules in course of preparation at the present time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Tennessee could get up one that would stop questions of that kind, it would serve the House well.

Mr. BYRNS. We never pass any gag rules over here.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS OR MUNITIONS OF WAR

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] whether he desires to use one half of the hour allowed me?

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, on this side of the aisle we have demands for 30 minutes, and we would like to have the full time.

Mr. POU. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield one half of the hour to which I am entitled to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] to be, in turn, yielded by him as he sees fit.

THOMAS JEFFERSON

Mr. BYRNS. With the indulgence of my friend from North Carolina, I want to say that I forgot to make a unanimous-consent request for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] to speak for 5 minutes on the subject of Jefferson's birthday. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] be permitted to speak for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, today is the one hundred and ninetieth anniversary of the birth of America's greatest statesman, Thomas Jefferson. The occasion should not be permitted to pass unnoticed. I can think of nothing more appropriate to say at this moment than to read the following remarks made by Mr. Alexander H. Stephens while he was a Member of this House.

The speech he made on that occasion was a controversial matter that engendered party feeling. On that particular occasion he said this, which I think is apropos at all times in all public matters in America:

If you who call yourselves "Republicans" shall, in obedience to what you consider a party behest, pass the measure in the vain expectation that the republican principles of the old and true Jeffersonian school are dead, be assured you are indulging a fatal delusion. The old Jeffersonian democratic, republican principles are not dead and will never die so long as a true devotee of liberty lives. They may be buried for a period, as Magna Carta was trodden underfoot in England for more than half a century, but these principles will come up with renewed energy, as did those of Magna Charta, and that, too, at no distant day. Old Jeffersonian democratic, republican principles dead, indeed! When the tides of ocean cease to ebb and flow, when the winds of heaven are hushed into perpetual silence, when the clouds no longer thunder, when earth's electric bolts are no longer felt or heard, when her internal fires go out, then, and not before, will these principles cease to live—then, and not before, will these principles cease to animate and move the liberty-loving masses of this country.

[Applause.]

ARMS AND MUNITIONS EMBARGO

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which is made in order by the rule is the so-called "embargo resolution." It is impractical, I think, to attempt to discuss the rule without including in such discussion comments upon the resolution which it makes in order.

The joint resolution is easily understood. It is simple in its language. It gives to the President of the United States authority to declare an embargo against the shipment of arms or the sale of arms and munitions of war in cooperation with other nations of the world whenever, in the judgment of the President, it is advisable to do so, having in contemplation, of course, the great cause of peace.

This is not a new resolution. It was earnestly recommended by the former President of the United States, Mr. Herbert Hoover, and it was also earnestly recommended by his Secretary of State.

It is hard for me to understand, Mr. Speaker, how opposition to such a resolution can find a basis. If men are furnished with arms they can carry on war. Certainly the withholding of implements of war makes for the great cause of peace.

All the joint resolution does is to give the President of the United States, in cooperation with other nations of the world, the authority to prohibit the sale and shipment of arms wherever he deems it proper to do so whenever nations are about to engage in war.

Now, all sort of factitious objections will be raised to this resolution. It will be attacked on the floor of this House notwithstanding the fact that it has earnestly been recommended by administrations controlled by both political parties. Certainly nations cannot fight each other unless they are provided with implements of war, and the converse holds true that where implements of war are withheld, of course, it leaves them in a less prepared condition to go to war. God knows that we all want to take whatever steps are necessary to promote peace throughout the world. [Applause.]

It is hard for me to understand how any other conclusion can be drawn from this resolution than that it makes for the great cause of peace. Mr. Stimson thought so, Mr. Hoover thought so, and our former colleague, Cordell Hull, is enthusiastically in favor of this resolution. Yet for 4 hours there will be debate upon the simple language of the resolution. One half of that time will be an attack upon it, and you will be told before the debate is over that instead of making for the cause of peace the resolution will almost certainly bring about war. Just how gentlemen arrive at that conclusion remains to be seen, but I predict here and now that you will hear that very argument advanced. I am heartily for the resolution myself; but with respect to this particular resolution it would be enough for me, if I did not have the enthusiasm for it that I have, that two Presidents of the United States have thought that it is necessary, and I have that confidence in this man in the White House that I am going along with him; call me a rubber stamp if you want to—I do not care a continental. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. We are passing some permanent legislation here. Does the gentleman maintain that Mr. Roosevelt will be in the White House forever?

Mr. POU. I hope and believe that he will be there for 8 years. Mr. Speaker, seriously speaking, I feel that this resolution ought to be overwhelmingly agreed to by the House. It ought to be sufficient when two administrations have declared the necessity for this legislation, when they are advised as to the conditions throughout the world much better than we can be advised; and when they tell us that it makes for peace and not for war, it ought to be sufficient to justify us in passing the resolution and sustaining these two administrations. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is with regret I find that we are again considering important legislation, legislation which brings about a radical change in the foreign policy of the United States, under what is fast becoming the traditional Democratic policy of an airtight rule. Here we have a simple resolution, 19 lines in length, with a single section that has really any meat in it, and yet we are compelled to say we cannot alter it if we will. Surely it cannot be said this time that there is an emergency; at least no such evidence has come to my knowledge. When the Democratic chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee came before the Committee on Rules, he was willing to bring this legislation up under an open rule. Unfortunately the leadership of the House decreed otherwise. I am genuinely sorry we cannot offer an amendment here, because I would like to perfect it so that it might meet with my support. I realize the fine idealism, the splendid purpose which prompted the bringing of this resolution to the consideration of the House. Ever since the dawn of civilization man has striven for the mirage which would bring universal peace to mankind. No one more than I would like to see that object attained. So it is with regret I am forced to the conclusion the resolution is so phrased that it will not further the cause, but rather, on the contrary, will be provocative of war.

I hold no brief for the ammunition manufacturers. Profit on business gained through the misfortune of the multitudes does not meet with my approval. I should be perfectly willing to support a resolution which would say in the event of war we would not ship arms to any country engaged in strife, but I do not want to give power to the President or anyone else to determine who is the aggressor nation.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Not now. What is the picture presented before the world today? There is war in South America, there is war in China, and everybody knows that in the chancellories of the world there is talk of the war to come. Everyone knows a proposal was made 10 days ago which, if it should be adopted—and I am speaking of the redivision of territories in Europe—could have but one purpose, and that is war. We must be careful in these dangerous days if we are to maintain peace. I am not attacking this resolution because of any opposition to the President of the United States. I am patriotic enough to believe that the American Nation, from George Washington down to Franklin D. Roosevelt, never had a man in the White House but was actuated by patriotic motives. I believe in his patriotism and sincerity, but I am afraid to take this power from Congress in this critical period. I want to adopt the more careful and conservative form of policy. I realize fully the pressure which will be brought to bear upon him if we pass this resolution. It will be terrific. We have realized within the last few years the dire effects of war, the suffering and hardships which come to the country and to the individual. With these pathetic scenes in mind, let us not discontinue the policy of neutrality too easily. I don't ask you to vote down the rule, because I realize the Democratic Party is committed to this close rule and will continue to be; yet I ask you to vote against the resolution in its present form.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Is it not a fact that this resolution is the identical resolution that was sent to the committee by a Republican President and endorsed by a Republican Secretary of State, and is it not true that the Republican Secretary of State appeared before the committee and asked that the resolution be adopted?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon rose.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I will answer that. That is true; and when it went to the Democratic Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, that committee, I think by a vote of 15 to 2, decided they would not make it world-wide in its scope but would restrict it to the American Hemisphere. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to speak upon the rule. I wished to speak briefly on the arms-embargo measure, but I went to the leading Republican member of the committee [Mr. FISH], as provided in the rule, and was there told I was the first Republican asking to speak for the embargo resolution and time could not be promised to me but that I might get it from the Democratic side. So I went over to the majority side, saw the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], and asked for 10 minutes. Apparently he understood I wanted to speak on the rule, but, if you will permit me, I will utilize time now, particularly as there is no contest on the rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In the absence of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] I only had charge of the time on the rule.

Mr. FREAR. I now understand, and appreciate it, and also the kindness generously extended by my friend in giving time unable to be had from my Republican colleague. I will take advantage of it now so as to be sure I get a few minutes to speak on the embargo resolution even though no right to support the resolution is to be given to Republican Members by our side of the aisle.

I cannot understand why a suggestion was made to me on the minority side when I asked for time to speak for the resolution that I "must not believe what pacifists say." No pacifist has talked to me about this resolution, nor am I a pacifist nor jingo. There is no purpose of pacifism here. In fact, the claim is made by opponents of the resolution that its passage means war. There is, perhaps, a spirit of jingoism among those who are constantly warning us of these numerous dangers. Watch the men who discuss this bill, here or elsewhere, to see whether or not that is an influence behind it. Who are the munition dealers whom this would affect and were they not partially responsible for the sinking of the Lusitania? I agree as to the horror of that great tragedy. But how did it occur; for it was a first step toward war. What was in the manifest of the Lusitania? Munitions of war, I have understood. When the Lusitania went down then every jingo wanted us to go to war. Why? Because the Lusitania was sunk in the war zone with American citizens upon it; but it also carried munitions of war. It is to avoid another like tragedy, so far as possible, that I would support this munitions embargo bill. I would prevent, so far as possible, any occurrence of that kind again by granting prior embargo action to a Republican or a Democratic President then in office, no matter who he might be.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Did the gentleman approve a program during the war that would have denied our furnishing munitions to the Allies?

Mr. FREAR. I thank the gentleman for that inquiry. I shall be glad to respond. The money we loaned our European Allies and $11,000,000,000, substantially, was spent in this country to pay American manufacturers of munitions, and to other Americans who furnished war supplies. The United States paid American manufacturers who provided munitions for the Allies. [Applause.]

Why not to Germany or the Central Powers? Only because American manufacturers could not get their munitions through the war zone prior to our participation. There is no sentiment in their business. When we loaned the Allies $11,000,000,000, whatever proportion the exact amount paid to American manufacturers may have been it was primarily to include payments due by the Allies for these munition purchases from Americans.

This Government thus financed American munition manufacturers and others furnishing war supplies, agencies that had helped provoke our participation in the war. That I would avoid in the future.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I suppose the gentleman would now prefer to pay tribute to Germany?

Mr. FREAR. Let me say, General, as I said before, jingoism so argued for our entry into war. You will find it urged on us, no matter who is the aggressor. It urges us to get into wars and argues that the Japanese or Germans or Russians will get us if we keep out. I voted against our entrance into the war. I voted with some of the leading men then here, with Claude Kitchin, leader on your side of the aisle. Also General Sherwood who had risen from a private to a generalship during the Civil War, with 44 battles to his credit. Other equally strong men were among those so voting against our entry into the European war. I have never been ashamed of nor have I apologized for that vote to this date. [Applause.]

I saw a President of the United States stand there, at the Clerk's desk reading his message. He made a statement to us that compelled many Members of Congress to vote for a declaration of war. It has a bearing on this resolution because it was the President of the United States who delivered that message to Congress. You say you are not going to give him that power by this resolution to declare an arms embargo. A President has that power today; not under the Constitution but by his own act and high place he can compel Congress to declare war. A President's power is supreme during war hysteria.

Mr. STUDLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STUDLEY. I understood the gentleman to say the Lusitania had munitions of war aboard?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. STUDLEY. By what authority does the gentleman make that statement?

Mr. FREAR. That was disclosed afterward by the manifests which were published at the time or shortly after.

Mr. STUDLEY. What about the investigation that the court made of that matter?

Mr. FREAR. I am not going to spend time to discuss that question here. The gentleman can take the floor in his own right if he wishes, but if the Lusitania had munitions of war and she was sunk, it was contended that that would justify a declaration of war by the United States, because she was acting pursuant to and under the protection of international law. I would stop that practice so far as possible by an embargo in advance. In fact, it was charged munition makers placed American seamen with their shipments to provoke war.

The United States should not be injected into war because some munitions maker or some manufacturer of war supplies sends a vessel into a war zone with Americans carrying those supplies to belligerents, there to be sunk by submarines. I care not whether German or English or what submarines they may be that seek to destroy the munition carrier. Why should that be a subject for war? Passage of this resolution, I believe, would prevent that threat, because no President would willingly invite war for his people. During a war hysteria, when bombarded by propaganda, it is then that Presidents and Congress yield to pressure.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. COX. I am entirely in sympathy with the gentleman.

Mr. FREAR. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. COX. I should like to inquire if it would please the gentleman to discuss the objections that are raised to the adoption of the resolution; that is, that it confers unconstitutional power upon the Executive, giving him the power to enter into treaties, and so forth.

Mr. FREAR. That to my mind is a pure figure of speech. The President of the United States today, not under the Constitution but by his act, can place this country in a position so that war is inevitable without any enabling act. Every man who has been in this House during a declaration of war knows that. For instance, his power is potent now in time of peace. What did this House do with the last bill passed today? Members stood here and complained about the bill for refinancing agriculture; they denounced the procedure, but they voted for a bill they could not amend, and this occurred today in time of peace.

Did you oppose the President's bill today? The record speaks for itself. What are we doing here day after day with administration measures? Voting for them practically unanimously. The country has placed the responsibility with him, and we are supporting him. I am not criticizing that action, but we are today following the President of the United States and the administration as was done prior to and during the war.

Is it possible that both Presidents Hoover and Roosevelt, who urged passage of this resolution, are seeking mere power when asking right to declare an arms embargo with belligerents? Would they want war or would they not rather seek to prevent war? Congress gave the President power long ago to declare an embargo on arms with countries on this continent. That was cheerfully yielded him by Congress. Why was it not dangerous then if dangerous now?

It has been whispered, or rather shouted, that this resolution is aimed at Japan. Japan is a familiar bogie man to conjure by. It is also a frequent cry that Russia and Communism are like menaces.

Jingo talk should be placed under padlock. If foreign nations treat these constant crys of Members of Congress seriously, it might be a cause for war, but I believe those governments correctly apprize cause and effect. According to these new warnings of a Japan threat, every Member voting for this resolution is also seeking to throw us into the League of Nations and the World Court when we give Presidents power to declare an arms embargo against belligerents. If so, then Presidents Hoover and Roosevelt were and are trying surreptitiously to lead Congress and the country down a blind alley with this munition embargo bill.

I leave to others who wish to follow such leadership and such reasoning an excuse for voting against the resolution, but a like law is now in force with South American countries. Other governments have that power, but President Roosevelt after June or July would have to call Congress in extra session again before he could declare an embargo against profiteering munition owners, or they might get us into war again. The President could prevent shipments to South American belligerents by law, but when he said to munition makers, "Keep clear of European belligerents", he would be committing a warlike act. We can best avoid European and Asiatic complications by steering clear of them before it is too late.

I concede many Members may, without prejudice, question this embargo resolution as drawn, but I should prefer to trust a President with partial or complete embargo powers rather than existing unrestricted license had by munitions dealers.

Mr. Speaker, from information received which I believe to be authentic, our colleague, Mr. FISH, now in control of time on the Republican side, a House military and diplomatic expert of known ability, offered a joint resolution in the House on January 7, 1928, declaring against shipment of munitions to any country excepting American countries in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction.

That resolution was not adopted; otherwise war, it is alleged, might have ensued with some of the many countries against which we are warned, if like power is given to the President. I am now only quoting arguments advanced against the pending arms embargo resolution.

Quoting from a speech in the House by our colleague Mr. FISH, a recognized military and diplomatic authority, I note he said:

> If we continue the policy of exporting munitions of war, we will be doing more to bring the United States into another war than anything we can do at the present time.

In that general purpose I am sure the House finds much to agree and trusts the present resolution may be enlarged on motion of our friend and colleague to include all countries and thus prevent any such catastrophe.

As a diplomatic adviser of the House due to his present high place on the Foreign Affairs Committee, I find our colleague and friend Mr. FISH quoted before the League of Women Voters as saying:

> There is one solution to the peace problem; I believe that the entrance of the United States into the World Court would be a step in that direction.

Personally I have not reached that entangling-foreign-alliance view, although am willing to be shown any error in judgment, and in like manner I have not reached a conclusion expressed by my friend and colleague Mr. FISH, who is further quoted as saying:

> I believe myself in the principles of the League of Nations at this time and I believe in the future we should go into the League with reservations.

Sharing a bewilderment that comes to my colleagues, I leave that phase of a subject hard to harmonize or understand with other views expressed as is the Einstein puzzle. More recently our esteemed colleague and friend, as a constitutional adviser and acting for the Congress of which he like ourselves is a Member, was quoted in the press declaring war on President Machado of Cuba to take effect "within a week or 10 days."

To those opposed to such threats of violence by our friend and colleague Mr. FISH it may be suggested published reasons given are—

> I cannot see the use of sending notes to Japan about Manchuria where we have only a few million dollars invested and saying nothing about Cuba where Americans own three quarters of the property—

And further—

> There is just one thing to do; send a strong ambassador to Cuba and have him inform President Machado that he must step aside for a provisional president.

Not because of the 4,000 Cubans apparently, but because of American banks that own three fourths of Cuban property.

That reason in part was urged for our entrance into the World War and drafting of 4,000,000 men to fight in France rather than the reason then expressed to save the world for democracy or wage a "war to end wars." American investments are not above making such demands, but getting back to the arms-embargo resolution before us, it discloses influences that not alone impel us to control the affairs of Cuba but to meddle with the affairs of both European and Asiatic countries, usually to our own disadvantage and great injury.

That my resolution to refuse conscription of American boys to fight European battles is not deserving credit for originality I quote from a speech made by me January 19 of last year:

> Congressman Britten, at present a leading member of the Naval Committee, page 297, April 5, 1917, offered an amendment to the declaration of war as follows:
> "Provided, however, That no part of the military forces of the United States shall be ordered to do land duty in any part of Europe, Asia, or Africa until so directed by Congress, excepting those troops who specifically volunteer for such service."

In that same speech I quote further—

Among many impressive words in debate on that same day, I quote from Representative Sherwood (Democrat), a lovable man who enlisted in the Civil War as a private. He was in 42 engagements and battles; promoted repeatedly for bravery, and finally was mustered out of that war with a brilliant record second to none, as a brigadier general.

No more courageous man ever represented his countrymen in Congress. He said on page 335, April 5:

"I cannot keep faith with my people by voting for this war resolution in its present form. I will vote for it if the provision to authorize an army to be sent across the Atlantic to participate in this European conflict is stricken out."

These two men voiced the same sentiments I have tried to put in legislative form by House Joint Resolution 125 that by constitutional provision would prevent the Army staff or any other agency from conscripting American boys to fight any more European battles. That resolution I desire to discuss more at length.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me to pursue the inquiry?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I take it the gentleman does not construe the power sought to be vested in the President to cooperate to mean power to enter into an alliance or to make a treaty without the consent of the Congress.

Mr. FREAR. Oh, surely not. That is provided by the Constitution, of course, but the Constitution also states that Congress shall declare war. Anyone who sat here in April 1917 knows we declared war immediately after the President's message was delivered to this House, and because of that message. His message informed Congress that American citizens were sunk on the Sussex when they were in the war zone, and naturally every American was indignant if that was a fact, but Secretary Lansing in a letter read just prior to the war declaration said to Congress a mistake had been made, innocently, of course, and that no lives were lost on the Sussex or Evelyn, yet that charge, made by the President, was one of the things that pressed us into war during 1917.

THE BEST WAY TO AVOID WAR

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the best way to keep out of war is not to permit American citizens to be drafted to fight European battles. I have made that proposal on the floor of the House repeatedly, and am glad to make it again, and shall make it whenever opportunity arises. The best way to keep out of war is not to permit American citizens to be drafted to fight European battles. A second prevention is to require the American people, mothers and fathers, and boys now drafted, to vote on the question of whether we should be thrown into another foreign war. I have again introduced resolutions, pending in the House at the present time, to accomplish this purpose, and will refer to them later in this discussion. Every mother will agree to that right, and every father will agree who has an interest in his son. Those who are drafted to fight in Europe have no voice now in that decision. They would all fight against invasion but many would protest against fighting in another "war to end wars." Let me say my father served 3½ years in the Civil War. My son served in the last war with the Thirty-second, at the front. A company I once organized served in the last war with the Thirty-second Division and lost 88 men killed or died in France. I raised a provisional company for the Spanish-American War and personally served 16 years in the Regular Army and National Guard. So I am not a pacifist nor am I a jingo, but against needless war. I resent anyone's saying that to declare an embargo against greedy munitions-manufacturers means war or else pacifism. They should take either one or the other position, not both. I believe in peace.

A few Members of Congress went overseas, but not 2 percent went to war; most of the remaining 98 per cent sat here in peace and aided the President in conducting operations, as you do today in time of peace. What the President said went with us, for once in war you have got to win; you have no other choice. That is what we did in 1917 and 1918. That is what Congress will do in any and every war. Less than 2 percent of the 530 Members will do any fighting, yet we are asked to protect our constitutional right to declare war or to declare an embargo against arms' shipment. We do not control either right in time of war.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Would not the gentleman think it right and proper that we have an embargo on arms to all nations regardless of whether it might be the idea of the President that we contribute arms to one particular nation?

Mr. FREAR. Surely, just the same as I believe in this resolution I hold in my hand. We have that right in existing law except that we confine it to the Americas. I would make it apply to any and all belligerents engaged in war. Why not? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the committee report on this resolution granting to the President power to declare an embargo recites that President Hoover asked for the same legislation now urged by President Roosevelt. I refuse to believe it should be made a party matter or that the minority report alleges any reasonable ground for refusal to grant that power to the President.

Proposal to give the President of the United States power to declare an embargo on shipments of munitions to any government is challenged by members of the committee because "it enables a President to involve us in war."

Let me say again that although the Constitution provides Congress declares war, history shows Congress generally is swept into war by propaganda and presidential action. War may be provoked by blundering military, naval, or by an undiplomatic diplomacy. Fool Americans traveling in danger zones, demanding unwarranted protection, uttering bombastic boasts, may all provoke war; failure to give safe protection to foreigners in our own country brings war threats.

Shippers of munitions and war supplies on the Lusitania or other ships sent to one of the belligerents invited destruction in the war zone. That could be avoided by a presidential embargo order made before war hysteria seizes the propaganda agencies.

JINGOES ARE IN EVERY COUNTRY

War parties in France, Italy, Russia, Germany, or the United States are afraid of peace or pacifism. They are usually set for war and so are all the profiteers and Army and Navy officers who may be in position to profit in place or purse through war. A presidential power to declare an embargo is only one step against war. Neither Presidents nor Congress can or will withstand modern propaganda of radio, movies, and personal lobbies that profit from wars, for all the horrors of war are forgotten or glossed over by these agencies that sound war's praises and glories.

Speaking for a large army of blind, crippled, and gassed veterans from European battlefields gathered at a Geneva peace disarmament conference, they said they represented 8,000 wrecks of manhood at that peace conference. They also represented 12,000,000 killed, who died all praying in the name of the same God for their country's victory before their untimely deaths. The dead are now voiceless; the 25,000,000 others who suffered casualties are scattered throughout the world, objects of pity and sympathy; many millions of bereft mothers and countless millions of relatives are all joined in opposition to wars and further barbarism. These men so scattered know what war meant. Those who shout for it and those who play the war game for profit do not know, and those who ignore veterans' just claims on their Government's bounty do not care.

A cut of $400,000,000 in veterans' aid and half as much from pay cuts of hundreds of thousands of Government employees is accompanied by a demand for an American "parity navy" to cost upward of a billion dollars, of which $230,000,000 is demanded by the Navy League and Navy lobby in 1933. Surely that will be viewed as a threat for war by warlike nations, but no protest arises from the munition-makers who profess to be scared stiff over a President's power to declare an arms embargo. Jingoism is found in other countries as well as ours.

Remember the United States last year (1932) spent for its present alleged antiquated, obsolete, third-power Navy, so estimated according to our own naval experts, a total of 50 percent in excess of all the combined naval expenses of England, France, and Italy, according to the World Almanac. England spent $50,476,000, France $94,823,000, and Italy $80,947,000, while we spent $353,000,000 for our own Navy. If naval experts are right, then a courtmartial should be called to know what we have received from these experts, since the World War, in exchange for over $5,000,000,000 collected from American taxpayers for war purposes, not including over 10 billion more spent for war interest and hospitalization of veterans during that peace period for wars, past or future.

If these war experts are trustworthy and another extra billion is now needed for a parity navy, the courtmartial should further find why that money was not more properly spent for national defense in airplanes that can sink $40,000,000 battleships, which did not dare leave their harbors during the last war through submarine threats.

No flimsy excuse about presidential embargo powers should affect Congress, but modern defense methods and weapons are demanded with a positive demand to avoid needless wars that Congress cannot prevent.

PEACE BROUGHT BY GUNS AND FEAR NOT PERMANENT

If afraid to trust the President, then we should be afraid to trust a Congress that will follow his directions for war. A real remedy against war lies in the hands of Congress—a remedy that will stop needless wars, certain to come unless such a remedy is adopted.

European jealousies, enmities, and century-old national rivalries prevent any of these governments from inviting confidence of their neighboring governments. This results in heavy war clouds constantly hovering over that war-stricken part of the world. Americans pride themselves that Europe believes our constant assurances of friendship and efforts toward international peace that covets neither world power nor territory.

That world has equal knowledge, while we are demanding reduction of armaments, urging peace convocations, and talking humanitarianism, that our war exports and advisers have their hands on the gun called a "parity navy", the most expensive and extravagant in the world. With one voice we say the world should forgive all their debtors and enemies, but we should be permitted to choose our allies when desired in again making the world safe for democracy and to fight another war to end wars.

One way to invite confidence in America's sincerity is by both acting and practicing peace. A high hurdle against war will invite international confidence by passing my resolution to permit the people to vote on war and refuse drafting American youth to settle Europe's wars. That act will mean more to Europe than all the empty promises and phrasing we put forth with assumed belief it carries weight to diplomats who distinguish acts from words.

HOW WE CAN PREVENT WAR

Mr. Speaker, for three consecutive sessions I have introduced House Joint Resolution 125 in substantially the form here discussed. If adopted, it will do more to keep this country out of foreign entanglements, as counseled by Washington, than all international peace meetings and Kellogg peace treaties combined.

Subject to the supreme right to repel invasion, I again submit a proposed antiwar amendment to the Constitution with a belief it will prevent wars certain otherwise to engulf us. Joint Resolution 125 in substance is as follows:

Congress shall have power to declare war only after the proposition shall have been submitted by the President to the several States and requests made of their governors to hold special elections on not less than 30 days' notice. A majority vote for war in a majority of said States shall first be cast before Congress declares war.

This amendment shall not be construed to prevent the President from using the Army and Navy by its Commander in Chief whenever deemed necessary to suppress insurrections or invasions.

The right of the people to be secure in their persons shall not be jeopardized by conscription or forced military service abroad, but when public safety demands Congress may so provide for service on the North American Continent but in no other place.

One provision of the resolution provides a majority of States must first affirmatively declare for war, and the second prevents conscription for foreign service during another war. Presidents who bring about situations that in the past have forced Congress to declare war should be without power to prosecute another foreign war. Every world expert advises our country is alone the most favorably situated to repel invasion and avoid war.

WAR IGNORES LAWS AND CONSTITUTIONS

John Bassett Moore, former Counsellor of the State Department, is quoted as saying a declaration by the President of an arms embargo against a foreign government "would permit the President to carry us into war without the prerequisite of Congress." The President can create and in the past has caused a situation that compels Congress to declare war. That fact is not open to successful controversy. He can do so if he so decides.

Congress is no more a free agent during war's hysteria, promoted by wild propaganda, than is a President. Any President who would precipitate a war by an embargo declaration in like manner would involve us in war by securing a declaration of war from Congress, easy to bring about. The balance wheel is not found in a President or Congress, but with the many millions who must fight and pay. If they decide for a foreign war, then they will bear the burden.

Under the existing National Defense Act plans for mobilizing man power assumes that Congress will adopt a "selective draft" act immediately on the declaration of "a national emergency"—war. The draft act of the Army staff provides for 11,000,000 men between the ages of 21 and 30, from which number 4,000,000 will constitute "class 1" during the first 12 months of a "major conflict."

Should the "emergency"—war—continue, additional recruits would be drawn from 800,000 young men reaching age of registration each year. The foregoing condensed plan has been worked out by the Army staff to use in addition to the Regular Army and National Guard heretofore relied upon for war. Our efforts to settle disputes in Europe, Asia, and other countries will require a constant supply of 800,000 young men annually after an "emergency" occurs in addition to the 4,000,000 drafted men and Regular Army and Navy. That picture may be alluring to the Army staff that loves power—and I have no personal feeling against the staff that finds many critics among experts—but the picture to 800,000 youth of the country drafted to fight each year may not be so attractive.

In case of invasion or insurrection universal war service would be demanded, but absolute power exercised by our military superior, Army staff, when in war is additional reason for war prevention.

Before assuming again to make the "world safe for democracy" why not make our own democracy safe by permitting it to determine when the American people will shed their blood for foreign governments, whether monarchies, democracies, or dictatorships. Rights to protect from invasion by foreign foes or suppress insurrection are with the President under the Constitution. As Commander in Chief he can prevent invasion.

POLITICAL PLATFORMS AND WAR

I remember the campaign that resulted in the reelection of President Wilson "because he kept us out of war." That was the verdict of the American people more plainly expressed than by any political party declaration. The Democratic 1916 platform said:

We hold that it is the duty of the United States to use its power not only to make itself safe at home but also to make secure its just interests throughout the world, and both for this end and in the interest of humanity to assist the world in securing settled peace and justice.

Empty words, as we now know.

The Republican 1916 platform sounded its peace slogan:

We desire peace, the peace of justice and right, and believe in maintaining a strict and honest neutrality between the belligerents in the Great War in Europe. * * * We believe in the pacific settlement of international disputes and favor the establishment of a world court for that purpose.

Again, empty words.

Two great party conventions so declared prior to that election. The Democratic candidate was reelected "because he kept us out of war." Within 6 months from the time of his reelection we were in war. It was claimed that Theodore Roosevelt would have moved for war a year before.

As I stated at the outset, President Wilson's reasons for waging war were incorrect in fact. His message to Congress said:

Let me remind the Congress that on the 18th of April (1916) last in view of the sinking on the 24th of March the steamer Sussex by a German submarine, without summons or warning, and the consequent loss of lives of several citizens of the United States who were passengers—

I quote from a letter read in the House by Congressman Cooper of my State 10 days before the declaration of war was passed in reply to the Sussex incident:

You are informed that no American citizens lost their lives on the Sussex and Evelyn. Very sincerely yours, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State.

No foolhardy American passengers, though taking chances in the war zone, were lost, but even so, it was no reason for the war that followed.

A President, however, was mistaken, he was misinformed and so was Congress; hysteria controlled and war was declared. That same situation will again occur for hysteria always controls. Presumably 80 percent of our people were opposed to war and they are now, for war seemed further away in 1916 than it does in 1933, but that 80 percent had no voice in the declaration of war.

Back on December 7, 1930, I said to the House:

Suspicion, fear, and hate are rampant in Europe today. I have recently visited nearly every country engaged in the World War from Turkey, Greece, Austria, Yugoslavia, and Italy to Hungary, Poland, and Finland with fairly long stays also in France, Germany, and Russia.

Following the World War the Treaty of Versailles with its carvings of territory taken from Turkey, Germany, Austria, and Russia furnished fuel for endless wars in the future. A half century is only a day in history and the map of Europe again will be changed. Eleven years after the armistice President Hoover declares that soldiers now under arms in active reserves number nearly 30,000,000, or 50 percent increase during peace times. These figures spell war, not peace. That was the picture then.

HOW WE "MADE THE WORLD SAFE FOR DEMOCRACY"

While "making the world safe for democracy" in 1918 we helped place Stalin, autocratic dictator of Russia, in control of 150,000,000 people. We helped Pilsudski, the Polish war general and dictator, to control Poland; so, too, with Mussolini in Italy, Hitler in Germany, and Rivera in Spain, all raised to high places by our efforts to "make the world safe for democracy." Three fourths of Europe, under dictators, is now ruled by force. Nearly every Central and South American government, with Cuba, is under dictatorship also ruling by force these democracies.

Japan, once a member, is rated by the League of Nations as an outlaw among nations. We are not a part of that League nor likely to be. Hitler now challenges the former European allies. Greece, Hungary, Austria, Rumania, Yugoslavia, the exploded powder magazine of Europe in 1914, again sputters. Our Army and Navy experts urge large increases in armaments to meet imaginary but potential foes. Peace is making slow progress by present plans.

Gen. William Mitchell, in command of 1,500 planes of all the Allies at the Battle of St. Mihiel, was a witness on March 30 this year before a Senate committee. Our Rip Van Winkle national defense was derided and he declared one department could handle all war activities with a saving of $250,000,000 annually. Planes and Zeppelins flying 6,000 miles, carrying enormous bombs, he asserted, are of more value than all reconstructed battleships and "parity navies" combined for offense and defense. In this he differs from some antiquated experts, as useless as their prized obsolete battleships.

Every navy yard and admiral would oppose any such sane proposal. General Mitchell's prediction of war with Japan only evidences views held by other military men, so the people who fight and pay should first decide when that war or any war is to come, and if so with whom.

As chairman of the Congressional Aviation Committee investigation in 1919, I examined General Mitchell, Rickenbacker, General Patrick, General Squires, and other world-famous American aviators. We spent a half billion dollars during the World War for battle planes and received none. I believe the world is with Mitchell, that battle planes, bombs, and gas are worth more for offense and defense in war than a hundred battleships and cruisers locked up in harbors. A thousand fighting planes would give protection to America and could be built for the cost of several useless battleships, now on the parity program of experts.

OUR "PREPAREDNESS" PROGRAM

It is an old slogan, "In time of peace prepare for war." That England did, that Germany did, that France did, that Russia did. All prepared back in 1914 for war, and all, whether victors or vanquished, were worse off after that war. It were better first following General Mitchell's preparedness advice that every effort at arbitration be had before we again indulge in war. Hair-trigger war declarations mean disaster to all parties. Without danger from foreign invasion, strong and powerful in our own field of action, we are weak and powerless under existing constitutional powers when resting our cause and fortunes with any Congress or any President surrounded by American methods of propaganda.

Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Spain, and Portugal for 5 years refused to join their people and property in wide-spread World War losses around them. Why did we join in that war? These countries surrounding the belligerents kept out. We were 3,000 miles away, but we got in. War profiteers gained; who else?

Let century-old enmities abroad settle their own differences in their own way, prevented, if possible, by our helpful advice, but let the Government of Washington and Lincoln, made up of the people from every nation of Europe and the Orient, remember that ours is the great melting pot and refuse again to divide our people or destroy their solidarity by another foreign war.

Let us help the world to maintain peace, not war, and as a guaranty of that peace send back to our people first of all the decision for peace or war before the die is cast. That is provided by the resolution I have submitted.

As before stated, I voted against our entrance into the European World War. General Sherwood, hero of more than 40 battles, Leader Kitchin, and others in that Congress so voted. Appeals to patriotism and national honor, voiced by selfish interests, hysterical propaganda, aroused vigorous protests against that vote. Misrepresentation of facts unverified and impossible to expose and a backfire from home States and districts difficult to visualize or comprehend occurred then and will occur again with any Congress that refuses to yield to war propaganda.

Innocent agencies were misled by that propaganda. Every munition maker, every military and naval officer, with rare exceptions, every navy yard and Army post center, every potential or actual profiteer interested in camp sites, in clothing, food, and war supplies was on the job. Every international banker with financial interests at stake aroused our banks to wire Members to stand by the "Army Staff", but no word came from the boys back home who were to do the fighting—the "veterans" of today.

They did not know that war so precipitated was to change life's course of several millions of our American youth. Some were immature lads thrown into a war "to end wars." Mothers, thousands of them, frantically protested against war, but they were far distant and their voices were smothered by propaganda reciting to Congress horrible, but untrue, tales of inhumanity practiced by foreign soldiers whose greatest fault we later learned lay in fighting for their own mother country and in praying to the same God for victory to their arms.

Vast sums of money from Northcliff and others, as I have before recited, fomented propaganda which threw us into that war. For a century Americans were taught to twist the British lion's tail. Northcliff's propaganda on Belgian horrors twisted the twisters. The majority of our people held no personal grievance against Germans nor English for the alleged American lives and property recklessly risked in the war zone, but once Congress spoke we were in war and thereafter had to win.

MORE WARS CERTAIN TO COME

Mr. Speaker, another war is in the making. Cumulative evidence has been laid before the House repeatedly that foreign diplomats, dictators, and other "rulers" are struggling to maintain their seats on safety valves, but whether the next foe be England or France or Germany or Italy or Russia or Japan or some other world power, the forgotten man, carrying the gun and hand grenade or handling the machine gun, tank, or plane does not know and is without voice to decide. He will be told who to fight and how, not why. Tennyson described the man in the ranks when he wrote—

Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.

Flag waving, flashing swords, and other demonstrations are for the man wearing shoulder straps or thoughtless youths and blustering civilians but not for men who do the fighting.

Without pride, but to give some faint knowledge of the subject discussed, I repeat as one whose direct ancestor was killed leading his company in battle during the Revolution and members of whose family were in the Mexican, Civil, and World Wars, I have rather definite understanding of that end of the game. Five years' service in the Regular Army and 11 years' additional in the State National Guard gave further understanding of the real picture not obscured by fantastic tales of military glory by those unfamiliar with the other game behind the scenes or by Members persuaded by propaganda to declare war. Even generals and Army staff officers many miles behind the lines in fighting rarely are heard to protest against war.

The company I organized long years ago returned from the Spanish-American War, reporting several dead and missing, but many were weakened by fever, embalmed beef, and other accompaniments of that brief Cuban campaign. That same company later returned from the World War reporting 88 men killed or died in France, and of the Thirty-Second Division, composed of Wisconsin and Michigan volunteers, over 13,000 casualties occurred during that war.

WAR'S WASTE IS BEYOND MEASURE

As a member of the committee of 15 appointed by the House in 1919 to investigate war waste and frauds, I had definite knowledge of what it means to wage war. Before me are a dozen large volumes, containing from 15,000 to 20,000 pages with recitals of wasted funds through "cost plus" and other profiteering contracts and schemes that portray a picture of greed and selfishness mingled with other pages of useless, but presumably honest experimentation of war machines. A proposal to take the profits out of war is as impossible as to restrain waste and cupidity during war.

Again, as chairman of subcommittee no. 1, investigating airplane expenditures and experiments, I quote briefly a single question and answer, illuminating as to results obtained:

Mr. FREAR. We did not during the whole period of the war get a single fighting machine or bombing plane to the front?

Secretary of War BAKER. Not a fighting machine or a bomber of American make.

Of $500,000,000 spent out of more than a billion dollars appropriated for airplanes and air service during 19 months of war, that was the result. We hired planes and experimented, but that answer from the record is from the highest authority. Railways with tunnels costing $100,000 per mile to carry wing beams for planes(?), as presented by the report, did not produce a single carload. Excuses and explanations to be urged during peace did not explain during war, when delay and failure meant lives of American boys in France. That page is closed, but embalmed-beef exposures and failures of men in every war will be repeated until a peace-loving people learn to avoid needless wars.

Men at the front served for a dollar a day in the mud and trenches in that war. Brothers and neighbors back home drew down from $5 to $10 a day in safety jobs while a silk-shirted home brigade in every town found it difficult to spend the sudden flood of funds received while working in the "home" trenches. Fathers and mothers, after months of worry and anxiety, were "compensated" with gold stars in place of the youth nurtured, educated, and finally snatched from the home without their consent for European service. That occurred with my home-town company's 88 dead in France.

The less said about war surroundings and travel opportunities the better, for everyone knows that hell is not alone on the firing line with gas and shellfire but also in fighting vermin, rain, mud, cold, sickness, hardships—all enemies that men must meet and overcome if they survive. Otherwise a gold star.

Another war will be worse for participants and helpless noncombatants, men, women, and children, according to experts. The World War was fought by 65,000,000, of which number 8,543,515 were killed or died from among 37,499,386 casualties.

One estimate gives a total war cost of 23,000,000 human lives and $200,000,000,000, as good a guess possibly as any. Our own loss of $40,000,000,000 is one we will be paying during many years yet to come and the debt to us from grateful (?) Allies may never be paid nor was that service appreciated. Congress once hooked and an army landed in France and thrown into the breach, all else was forgotten.

We are now spending over 50 percent of our annual $4,000,000,000 Budget for past and future wars after 14 years have elapsed since the armistice. Three quarters of a billion dollars annually is being spent for our Army and Navy, although parity with Great Britain is no more necessary than parity with Iceland or Greenland.

It is brought about through constant pounding on Congress by the Navy League and a $2,000 a month Shearer, employed by the Hearst papers and other like agencies that thrive on war and sensationalism.

I ask is it not just that in a democracy where the vote of a mother or youth just of age is equal to that of the highest official at the polls that those most concerned in peace or war and who bear most heavily and proportionately the physical and financial war burdens should have voice in the necessity for war? Now they have none. No right to express their desires or protest against enforced foreign service.

When Washington's foreign entanglements were a warning fresh in American minds, it did not seem important to the forgotten man in the ranks, but now when Congress can be thrown into a paroxism of fear by radio, press, and similar propaganda, with or without Executive influence, some protection should be extended to the people whom Washington's advice would protect.

ANOTHER FORGOTTEN PAGE OF WAR'S GLORY

Over half those presented for the selective draft and conscription, I have been informed, sought to escape war service, offering either genuine or frivolous excuses, but they were helpless and voiceless. Men were called cowards to care to live, by those who were usually exempt from fighting because of age or disposition, yet the car of Juggernaut rolled over all protests in order to form an army of 4,000,000 men with which to help America's new-found Allies whip their enemies in Europe and make the world safe for democracy to be ruled by dictators.

Reasons were advanced to justify conscription as the only way to secure an army and the war that followed; but, although our Government was supposedly among the victors in war and presumably entitled to profits, glory, and glamor that goes to victors, none were realized; and, on the contrary, the average man on the street who shouted for war in 1917 will say it was fought without sufficient cause or results by the American people. More than that, the average American of today who views these terrible war effects, both to Allies and Central Powers, and our own enormous losses, followed by the present disastrous depression and practically wide-spread misery, would be the first to condemn a Congress that votes another world war. Yet Congress that surrenders in time of peace follows the President when he says "war"; and he says "war" when propaganda often mistaken for public sentiment says "war."

This embargo resolution, if enforced in time by a President, would help to prevent hysterical propaganda that ends in war.

As I stated in the beginning, in this present depression and emergency Members of both House and Senate, responding to a "mandate from the people", have largely abdicated functions of legislative government when we accept and pass bills which give to the President powers almost equal to those of the average European dictator, not now to declare war but to perform peace functions of government ordinarily a part of our parliamentary duties. I am not opposing these recommendations because I have nothing better to offer, but call attention to the situation presented as indicative of what any and every "war Congress" would do. Congress will follow the Executive's recommendation and declare war, as it has always done.

If Congress yields its legislative duties to the President in times of peace, is there anyone who fails to understand what happened April 1917 when every Member was dragooned and pounded unmercifully into an atmosphere of war hysteria by propaganda demanding "stand by the President."

America, which sought to make the world safe for democracy and fought a war to end wars, failed to save any European democracy, nor did we end wars or receive a foot of territory or a dollar in remuneration for our losses. In fact, all of our European debtors seemingly have joined in an effort to repudiate their debts to us. Our own taxpayers must stand any heavy additional burden of European debts left unpaid in addition to our tremendous losses. Having in mind its past abject surrender during a war hysteria and present surrender to the Executive in peace legislation, will Congress say that the people who fight and pay shall not be the ones first to decide when war shall come?

I am submitting the resolution for your consideration with this embargo resolution. I urge its passage because I have lived to see a President and an American Congress surrender to propagandists. The American people can do no worse than Congress. They may be relied upon to do better. Let those asked to fight foreign battles first vote for war before we again make mistakes that may destroy our own Government and a civilization built up by a century and a half of progress, and as a partial preventative against war give to the President power to restrain greedy profiteering munitions makers who otherwise provoke war.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a considerable misunderstanding about the proposal before us. As a matter of fact, I agree with a great deal of what the gentleman from Wisconsin said. Unfortunately, the gentleman from Wisconsin is not familiar with what has occurred in the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the last year or so and does not know that many of us go just as far as he does and want an embargo, or multilateral treaty, to prevent the shipment and sale of munitions of war to all nations, such as the Briand-Kellogg Pact renouncing war as an instrument of national policy except for defense. He has the idea that those of us who are opposing the pending arms embargo are supporting the munition makers.

I have for years practically led the fight here trying to place embargoes on all munitions of war. I go so far as to favor taking over the munition factories and having them owned by the Government. [Applause.]

The gentleman who last spoke did not quite realize that this resolution gives the power to the President of the United States to pick out the aggressor nation and to declare an embargo in cooperation with other nations against one nation whom he thinks is the aggressor. I say to you in good faith that this is not a partisan issue. I opposed it under the last administration when recommended by President Hoover and the Republican Secretary of State.

This arms embargo is an utterly novel, warlike, dangerous, and revolutionary proposal, the most dangerous proposal that has been presented to the House of Representatives in the 12 years I have been here, and those of my friends who have served with me that long know that as a veteran of the World War I loathe and abhor war and that I have supported the Kellogg-Briand Pact and conferences to limit armaments. My opposition to this resolution is based on the fact that I am convinced—most sincerely convinced—that this is not an act of peace but is an act of war; that it leads directly to war and, if applied to European nations or to the Far East, will drag us into every foreign war.

Against whom is this resolution aimed? Why the emergency? Why the rush? It is self-evident to every American, no matter what the State Department says. Let us tear off the veil and present the facts to the American public. In doing so we must first present the facts to the representatives of the people here in the House before they decide how they vote, whether they shall vote to give the President the power to act as a dictator of peace or war and join hands with the League of Nations to determine who is the aggressor nation.

We will prove to you before we conclude this debate that this is not the entrance into the League of Nations through the back door or through the trap door, but through the front door to enforce articles X and XVI of the League of Nations, the most objectionable, the most obnoxious, the most vicious provisions of the League Covenant, which were overwhelmingly repudiated in 1920 and 1924.

This is not the World Court issue. I admit if that were raised I would not know how I would vote. There is much to be said for the World Court. It carries out certain traditional policies of the United States, but this embargo resolution accomplishes one thing, Mr. Speaker, one thing of paramount importance to our traditional foreign policy.

Mr. FISH. May I have 3 additional minutes?

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from New York 3 additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. This does one vital and paramount thing; it utterly destroys and repudiates the entire American policy of neutrality as proclaimed by George Washington and his Secretary of State in 1793 and adhered to by every President and every Secretary of State, including Woodrow Wilson. We will prove this to you as we go along, not only that it is a pure League of Nations proposition, that it is an attempt to determine the aggressor nation, that it destroys our neutrality laws and policy, but is even in violation of the spirit and wording of the Kellogg-Briand Pact. Under general debate we will prove each and every one of these statements.

In conclusion, I wanted primarily to speak against this iniquitous rule. It has been customary in every Congress, Democratic or Republican, to bring in certain types of legislation, such as tariff bills and certain soldier legislation, under rules that prohibited amendments, but almost no other legislation. When you bring in rules of this kind not permitting amendments, you are destroying representative government. You Democrats were elected upon a platform of progressive principles, yet you bring in here the most vicious gag rule of the most ultrareactionary character that will rise to plague you for years to come. There probably would not have been more than 3 or 4 amendments offered to this resolution, but with the exception of one motion to recommit no other amendments will be permitted under this vicious and despotic rule.

We are not going to waste time asking for a record vote on the rule, as we know that the party whip has cracked and that you will jump through the hoop. We are simply stating the truth to you. We are merely stating the fact that you have started and are well on your way to destroy representative government in the House. You have destroyed the rights of the minority and your own individual rights as Democratic Members, as well as your privilege and your power to amend legislation and to shape legislation in the House of Representatives.

We will have to write above the Rules Committee—and I have the utmost friendship for the chairman and every other member of the committee—"All hope abandon, ye who enter here." They have made it a Democratic principle now to bring in legislation not giving even a Democratic Member the right to amend. We have become the servants of the Rules Committee and they have become the masters of the House. I want to register a protest against bringing in this rule or any other rule that takes away the power of the individual Member or the minority to offer amendments and function in an orderly way in framing legislation as representatives of the people instead of as rubber stamps. How far is this Rules Committee autocracy going and how long can it continue without destroying representative government and the dignity and prestige of the House?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman said we were abandoning, by this resolution, our traditional position of neutrality. Did we not scrap neutrality when we entered into the Kellogg Pact?

Mr. FISH. Certainly not. I shall speak on that at length later.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], a member of the committee.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I trust that Members will not permit the opposition to this resolution to make them flee from what I construe to be nothing more than a purely peace measure, with the argument that the adoption of this resolution brings this country into the League of Nations. There is no merit in this contention.

The opposition makes the point that the resolution undertakes to confer power upon the Executive to enter into alliances and make treaties with other powers. I respectfully submit that this argument is not tenable and is not supported by any fair construction of the language used in the resolution.

It is simply proposed—

That whenever the President finds that in any part of the world conditions exist such that the shipment of arms or munitions of war from countries which produce these commodities may promote or encourage the employment of force in the course of a dispute or conflict between nations, and, after securing the cooperation of such governments as the President deems necessary, he makes proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, or sell for export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country or countries as he may designate, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Empowering the President to cooperate with other nations in placing an embargo upon the exportation of munitions of war is not empowering him to enter into alliances or treaties that are in any wise violative of the Constitution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the gentleman or, perhaps, some other member of the majority on the committee that reported this resolution, given any consideration to the definition of the term "munitions of war"?

Mr. COX. I understand the term is a well-defined one. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Bacon] who appeared before the committee, as I recall, made that statement. So far as I am concerned I have not looked to determine just what construction has been put upon the phrase in its use in international affairs.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit, I may say, in answer to the question, that there is a statement from Attorney General Wickersham about that matter.

When this matter was up in 1912 there was a statement from Attorney General Wickersham answering the question which the gentleman has just asked and which I shall be pleased to call attention to at the proper time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not familiar with the definition given by Mr. Wickersham, and I was wondering if such a definition would be binding upon Presidents in the future, whatever it is.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, this is not a political question in the sense it is a party question in this country.

I presume it has been stated to the House that the present administration supports this resolution and that the prior administration supported it. The Secretary of State of the last administration said in his communication to the President in support of a resolution of the substance of the pending one:

I feel very strongly that the Government should, without further delay, make this contribution to the efforts which are demanded by public opinion in all parts of the world toward the preservation of peace among the nations.

[Applause.]

It would strengthen the efforts of this Government and would hearten the advocates of effective reduction and limitation of armament in other nations if this Government could at this time take the preliminary step of ratifying the arms traffic convention of 1925.

In the meantime, while we are awaiting the necessary international action to bring about the effective supervision and control of the international traffic in arms, this Government is hampered in the efforts of its diplomacy by the inadequacy of the authority of the President over the export of arms and munitions of war from the United States. The effect of these efforts would be materially strengthened if that authority could be increased so as to enable us to cooperate with other governments in dealing with some of the conflicts of arms, actual or threatened, with which the world is now confronted.

The authority of the President over the exportation of arms and munitions of war, in my opinion, should be broadened so as to permit of the control of such exports in certain situations in the furtherance of the efforts that are constantly being made toward world peace and conciliation of international differences. The law as it now stands allows sufficient control by the President over shipments to American countries and countries wherein we exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction when conditions of domestic violence exist in such countries. It does not, however, confer upon the Executive any authority in cases of threatened or actual conflict between two or more countries. We frequently find that, at the very moment when we are bending every effort toward conciliating differences between friendly states, arms are being shipped from private manufacturers in the United States for use in the threatened or actual conflict.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. Rogers].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I hope you have all read the minority report. I want here to read several paragraphs from the letter of the Honorable John Bassett Moore, the great Democratic statesman, universally conceded the foremost authority on international law:

The pending resolution is, I do not hesitate to affirm, opposed to the settled policy and the highest interests of the United States and also to the provisions of our Federal Constitution. If adopted, it would enable the President (1) to make international engagements of the most far-reaching kind at his will, without the advice and consent of the Senate, and (2) to carry us into war without the prerequisite constitutional declaration of war by Congress. Perhaps it may be answered that by the proposed resolution the Senate would voluntarily abdicate its constitutional powers regarding international engagements, and that the Congress would likewise abdicate its constitutional powers regarding the declaration of war. This argument might be accepted if the Senate and the Congress could constitutionally divest themselves of their constitutional powers and commit everything to the Executive. But, as they were unwilling to do this during the so-called "World War," when it was proposed to give the President complete dictatorial powers, I can only suppose that the present extraordinary agitation is due to the misleading and somewhat deafening clamor of those who, in the name of peace, would confer upon the President an unlimited right to engage in hostilities. I refrain from saying an unlimited right to make war only out of deference to the profound and learned authorities who assure us that war can be abolished either by calling it peace or by refraining from calling it war. This is, I may remark, a favorite notion with those who demand that the Kellogg Pact shall be equipped with "teeth" in order that it may masticate alleged "aggressors" and otherwise benignantly bite and gnaw its way to universal peace and concord. Unfortunately, there are many who appear to have been infected with these confused notions which have been so industriously propagated in the United States. But judged by the course of the principal members of the League of Nations during the past 10 years and by their attitude toward the hostilities lately in progress in the Far East and elsewhere, such notions appear never to have had any real charm for the responsible authorities of the countries which would have been required to make the chief sacrifices in blood, in treasure, and in tears. To say this is not to impeach their wisdom or their sincerity. It may merely indicate that, having had enough of war, they long for real peace and an opportunity to recuperate.

Should the proposed measure become a law, no gift of prophecy is required to foretell what will follow. Groups moved by interest, or swayed, consciously or unconsciously, by propaganda, will clamor at the White House and at the Department of State for the unneutral application of the ban in favor of those whom they like or approve and against those whom they dislike or disapprove. We are assured that we may trust our authorities to resist such importunities, and to refrain from doing things that would involve the country in trouble. In other words, we are told that our authorities may be relied upon to refuse to exercise the powers so sweepingly conferred upon them. This is indeed a singular argument. Couched in the language of irresponsibility, it is not only self-stultifying but also unjust. The burdens and cares resting, especially at the present juncture, upon those who administer our affairs, are already grave and harassing enough without imposing upon them the pastime of playing with war. Within the terms of the pending resolution, our Government would be asked to set itself up in rash and arrogant judgment upon the acts of other nations and on the merits of their conflicts, with a view to give or to permit military aid to one as against another. Before committing ourselves to this presumptuous program, spun of the wild and flimsy fantasy that, when nations fall out and fight, the question of the "aggressor", which still baffles students even of ancient wars, lies upon the surface of things, and may be readily, safely, and justly determined by outsiders, of whose freedom from individual interest or bias there is no guaranty, we should reflect upon the fact that, had such a notion heretofore prevailed, we might and in all probability should ourselves have been the victim of it. As a marshaling of all the incidents would unduly prolong this letter, I will call attention to only two.

During our Civil War we were more than once menaced with the possibility of intervention, and, had it taken place, no one can say how fateful would have been the consequences. But, as an American, I share with my fellow-countrymen, as members of a great and united people, the universal sense that it is well that we were not permanently divided.

Do you Members of Congress think for one minute that your constituents voted to send you here to give the President the authority to make a declaration of war against any country without your first voting in Congress upon that declaration of war? It is clear to my mind that if we give the President the power to declare an embargo on munitions and arms against any country or countries it is a nonneutral act; it is a declaration of war; and that country can, of course, attack us as a reprisal.

Take, for instance, the situation in countries of the far-off waters where our battleships may be roaming about. We declare an embargo of arms against a country in that locality, and do you not suppose there would be reprisal? Do you not suppose they would attack our battleships? What would happen if they attacked us? How could we defend our country? Where would our Navy be? How could we defend our neutral rights? We would have no neutral rights to defend at all.

The whole world views with amazement the fact that we have never had and undoubtedly never will have predatory designs upon any land on the globe. We have always thought in terms of peace. We have always acted in terms or measures of war only to bring about peace. We are peace-minded. We have never fought save for a just cause. But there are limits to our unselfishness. We know what price war to this generation and to the generation yet unborn.

Our greatest war contribution to peace was our participation in the great World War, which secured peace for so many countries. I believe that no one in this room desires world peace more earnestly than I. I doubt if anyone has seen more constantly those who have paid the cost in human suffering of the World War.

Congress recently gave the President the power to cut our veterans' benefits in an effort to maintain the credit of the United States, and he has taken away the entire compensation of some men and has cut the compensation of probably all of the men and women who were connected with it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the lady yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am sorry, but I have not the time. We know what the cost of the World War alone was in human life and continues to be in human misery. We know what the cost of war is to our industries; what the drain to the United States Treasury. The taxpayer can tell you; the man in the street.

There is much distressing, insidious propaganda about. I have heard people say, "If we had another war we would have good wages again. The country would be prosperous." How little these people who are saying that realize that undoubtedly the terrible cost of our participation in the World War is responsible largely for our economic chaos today. Other countries are unsettled. There are rumblings of strife and conflict in Europe today. If we have another war, it will be the most horrible war known to history. Other countries would be glad to have us pull their chestnuts out of the fire. They would like to have us fight their battles for them. They do not care what happens to us—perhaps theoretically they do, but practically they are thinking only of themselves.

I cannot for one minute go along with this resolution. I am not influenced by party feeling in this matter, for in 1929 in Philadelphia at the Academy of Political and Social Science I spoke against the resolution introduced by the Republican Senator CAPPER, which is similar in some respects to the present question. At that time I said in part:

EFFECTS OF THE RESOLUTION BY SENATOR CAPPER

It is my belief that the resolution by Senator CAPPER will not help to make the Kellogg Pact effective. In fact, I fear that it might hinder its becoming effective. The Capper resolution would prevent our being neutral, as it would make the United States the judge of every conflict. A decision called for in every case would mean abolition of neutrality, thus reducing all nations to the legal status of belligerents, even although actually not engaged in hostilities. Legally the whole world would become belligerents.

Senator CAPPER'S resolution gives to the President the responsibility of deciding who is the aggressor in the case of a war, and it forces the President to embargo American exports to that country. This would make us a cobelligerent with other nations in disciplining such a nation.

In such a situation we could not use our Navy to insure the respect of our neutral rights, for we should have no neutral rights to respect. The United States would be entangled in every European fight—which, in my opinion, is the last thing that the American people desire.

If the United States decided that a country be guilty of violating the Kellogg Pact, this decision could easily be considered a breach of neutrality. If this country declared an embargo on the shipment of arms to the country that the United States adjudged guilty, it is probable that that country would fight us if she were prepared to do so. It might thus precipitate the United States into a war.

It is conceivable that a country which might be considered the aggressor, which signed the multilateral treaty and thereby renounced war forever as an instrument of its national policy and agreed never to seek the solution of any question which might arise between it and other signatories by any save a peaceful means, when in fact that country was being absorbed by some other nation and had to fight for self-preservation. In that event the country that really needed assistance would be prevented from receiving it.

If it were made impossible for countries to secure munitions of war from any other country, it would mean that every country would spend vast sums and endless time in making machinery of war. It would mean that the biggest and the most prosperous country would always be victorious in war, for, without an adequate supply of the necessary implements of war, no nation could win.

If this country should pass the Capper resolution, and the other countries did not, there would be an impasse. To make the Capper resolution effective every nation of the world must pass a similar resolution. This resolution would be a terrible hardship upon the small and poor countries. It would mean that they would be entirely at the mercy of the big and prosperous nations that had predatory designs.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOYLAN). The time of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to say, if I can, a word in defense of orderly legislation. I want to say a word in defense of the rights of this House. I want to say a word in defense of the rights of the individual Members of this House.

There have been five bills brought before this House during this short session under rules which forbid amendments.

I dare say that this resolution today providing for this rule is the most offensive violation of the rights of the House within the history and the record of the House. Here is a page-and-a-half bill, a 2-section bill, if you please, a 19-line bill, if you please, and you have a rule which provides that we cannot offer a single amendment to it. So far as I am personally concerned, I have no particular amendment I want to offer to it, but my rights are not what are involved in this matter. The rights of the House, the rights of the other Members are involved. Why bring in a bill like this with a rule making it not subject to amendment? I should not be surprised if this bill were considered under the regular rules of the House that there would not be many amendments offered.

Here is what the truth of the matter is—and I wish all of the new Members were here. The leadership of this House is afraid of you new Democrats; it is afraid to trust you to come here and do your constitutional duty in respect to passing on these bills. Your leadership is not fearful that 117 Republicans can wreck Democratic legislation with bad amendments. Your leadership knows that 313 Democrats are perfectly able to protect Democratic bills. What your leadership is afraid of is that you new Democrats cannot be trusted in voting on amendments. Let me say to every Member of this House, old and new, that the people of your respective districts elected you to represent them. They did not elect the leadership of this House or anyone other than you to represent them.

Every man who sits here and votes for these rules which make it impossible for him or his colleagues to offer amendments then and there makes confession that he is incapable of offering amendments and, what is more, that he individually is incapable of even voting safely and sanely upon amendments offered by other Members of this House.

The Member who sits here and continually votes for these rules which prevent amendments but says to his constituents and to his country that he is either incapable of passing on legislation or does not have the courage to pass on legislation. Members did not tell their constituents before the election that they were not personally capable of passing on legislation. You who vote for these rules are going to find that your constituents are not going to accept as an excuse for bad legislation for which you voted that it was considered under a rule which would not permit you to offer amendments or pass on amendments. This is especially true when the RECORD shows that you voted for the rule which made impossible any improvement in the criticized legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, it seems when the Congress has nothing else to do it makes some more crimes. Last week a press censorship bill was passed, only 29 of us voting against it. This made it a crime to publish, without authorization, any matter prepared in any official code, and so forth.

Now we are asked to make another crime, making the individual exporting arms or munitions in violation of a Presidential decree a criminal. Has the Congress nothing else to do? Thirteen million men and women are unemployed and children are underfed. Let us give consideration to American children who are hungry instead of bothering about some foreign nations that are fighting each other.

This bill should be defeated. I served in the Army of my country in time of war. Let no one say of a man who left his home and loved ones in response to a grave national duty that he does not desire to maintain the peace of the world. This bill makes for war, not peace.

This bill gives dictatorial powers to the President. If, in his judgment, such conditions exist that the shipment of arms and munitions may promote the employment of force, he may proclaim it unlawful to export arms and munitions. It then becomes a crime for any individual or company to export arms or munitions. True, the bill says, "after securing the cooperation of such governments as the President deems necessary." I say this bill authorizes the President to issue such proclamation without securing the cooperation of any government. The President may not deem it necessary to secure such cooperation.

If there is any occasion for the passage of this bill, it is because soldiers of the Imperial Japanese Government are invading Chinese territory. If it be the desire and purpose of the American Congress to place an embargo upon the shipment of arms and munitions to the Chinese, who need arms and munitions, and to the Japanese, who do not need our arms and munitions, this should be done by act of Congress, not by giving dictatorial powers to the President.

I represent no manufacturer of arms or munitions. In fact, I do not even know such a manufacturer, and do not believe that the private manufacture of munitions should be permitted in this country.

In this time of distress and suffering, with millions of our people deprived of the opportunity to be gainfully employed, my position is that this bill is uncalled for, unnecessary, wrong in principle, and should be defeated. We should not surrender legislative authority of the Congress and place that power in the hands of our President and succeeding Presidents, giving him and them power to take sides in a conflict by depriving one nation in need of arms and munitions of the opportunity to purchase such munitions in this country.

This measure is dangerous. It gives the President arbitrary power to impose an embargo. It makes him a judge of foreign disputes. It permits him to decide who is an aggressor nation. In fact, it gives him the power to declare war. I hope that the time has not come, and will never come, for the representatives of the people to surrender their greatest and most important power—the right to declare war. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, at the outset I wish to tell you that, being a new Member, it was not my intention to address this body during this special session of Congress. But with the introduction of the resolution now before the House, I find it necessary to voice my opinion in protest.

As a member of that great peace organization, the American Legion, which has honored me by electing me to many high offices in the Department of Illinois; as one who served 27 months during the World War, mostly at the front with the Fifty-eighth Artillery Brigade, I feel assured that you realize fully my honorable motives. Every man and woman of this body unquestionably has just as honorable intentions. There is not any question that every one of us, whether he is for the resolution or against it, equally hopes for peace and not war. There is not any doubt in my mind about the sincerity and good judgment of our President. If there was any doubt about that in my mind, I would not have supported him in his banking, economy, and other measures.

But as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I naturally have had the opportunity of going into this subject to a greater extent than most of you, the same as the members of the Agricultural Committee and the Banking Committee have had the opportunity of studying their problems more than the rest of us. After a thorough, unprejudiced study I believe the proposed embargo is not an act of peace, but something which would eventually lead us to war.

In the event that foreign nations become engaged in war, what should be the attitude of the United States? I believe that Washington answered that question many years ago when he said, "Keep free from foreign entanglements."

Those were words of wisdom, and I believe it well to heed them. To disregard them would unquestionably lead us to darkness. The surest way for us to have peace is to keep free of foreign disputes, to keep free of any method of cooperation with other countries, to keep free of giving power to any man in the event of war to pick the aggressor, something that is impossible to do impartially, and impartiality is the surest means to neutrality.

I ask you candidly if neutrality is not the best policy to follow in order to keep us out of war? Then I ask you if we could be considered neutral in the event of war between France and Italy, if Italy were determined the aggressor and an embargo were placed against Italy—I ask you what would be the result? I do not believe there is any question in the minds of any of us. Italy would declare war on us. Apply the same principle to ourselves. What would happen if we were at war with some South American country, and some foreign ruler determined we were the aggressor and placed an embargo on us and at the same time furnished arms and munitions to our enemy? Would it not inflame the passion of our people?

Ramsay MacDonald said, "The United States has the means to be neutral. There would not be any question," he said, "of the attitude of England if we were in the same position as the United States."

I believe there should be an embargo against all countries engaged in war. That could not give just cause for reproach. And until that time comes, I fairly and sincerely urge you to vote against the resolution, thus keeping the power in the hands of Congress, a power which has been in its hands since the beginning of our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time, 7 minutes, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, some of the attacks on the form of rule which the Rules Committee brings out may in some instances be justified. Whether or not any attention should be paid to them depends upon the particular circumstances. When the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] tries to embroil the new Members of the House and makes them believe their rights are being taken away from them, of course, he is not concerned with the rights or prerogatives of any of the Democratic Members of the House. He speaks as though they were elected here as individuals. As far as I know, everyone was elected as a Democrat, a part of the Democratic administration, pledged to the Democratic platform, agreeing to stand behind a Democratic President, and carry out that platform to fulfillment. That kind of bonfire, of course, will not accomplish anything. In the organization of this House each standing committee has a majority and minority membership.

The ideas of the minority membership as to amendments can always be offered in committee. Any Member of this House can appear before a committee; and if he has a meritorious amendment, it can be offered and put into the bill. There was no idea on the part of the Rules Committee of foreclosing on this question.

Now, what is the situation? I understand the one big amendment that would be offered, if the bill were open for amendment, would be to confine the provisions of this resolution to the American continent. I understand that is a fact. Under this rule, with the power to offer one motion to recommit, that can be voted upon. With all the Republican members on the Foreign Affairs Committee opposed to the resolution, they can put in that motion to recommit and offer the amendments which they would like to offer on this floor and have a roll call on all amendments. What is the use making believe something that does not exist?

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. Under a motion to recommit, no one can offer an amendment except a member of the committee. The rest of us are closed out. Now, on the same argument, if the gentleman thinks there are only one or two amendments, what harm is there in proceeding with orderly legislation and giving every Member an opportunity to offer amendments?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, I understand the gentleman from Kansas has no amendment to offer himself, but with the situation here, where it has developed into a partisan question, and where every Republican member on the Foreign Affairs Committee is opposed to this bill, any one of them can rise in his place and offer a motion to recommit, which would cover every amendment. Now, why pretend that you cannot accomplish the same purpose? Why talk about this being gag? This is not gag on this particular question. If you want to confine it to the American Continent, you can offer your motion to recommit and do it in that way.

Now, the peculiar anomaly that presents itself in the debate on this resolution is just this: The Republicans made it a partisan question. They said, "If you bring this before the House, we will have to tell the truth, and it means war. We will name the country. You will have war within 30 days." These peaceful Republicans, whose contributions in campaign times come to a great extent from the munition makers of America! I hope the Republicans are not going to pretend to be the peaceable party of this Nation. They say, "If you bring it here and talk about it, it will cause war," and then they come in and say they want 2 hours or 3 hours.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; I cannot yield now.

They say 2 hours or 3 hours will not be enough debate. "We want to talk about this dangerous thing 5 hours or 6 hours." They are so concerned with preserving the peace of the country and not talking out in school or washing our linen in public that they want to talk for 2 days, and it was principally because of their insistence that we extended the time to 4 hours.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell us whom Du Pont favored in the last campaign?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, I know whom they have been favoring and whom they represented in another body for years. I am not going to talk about Bridgeport or other places like that, because we never have many Democrats up through that party of the country.

Now, there will be dragged out the old bugaboo about the League of Nations, about our going into the back door or the front door or the cellar or some place. That is the old threat that will be dangled over our heads as though it would frighten somebody. They talk as though there was a Nation-wide referendum some years ago, back in 1920, when the Republicans happened to win the Nation. I know the Members of this House. Those Republicans who were for the resolution up to a few months ago I know will not be sincerely deceived, but I feel sure that the Members on the Democratic side of the House know that if Congress would never plunge this Nation into an unjustifiable war, this Nation will never be plunged into such a war by the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the White House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question occurs on the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FISH) there were ayes 66 and noes 35.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That whenever the President finds that in any part of the world conditions exist such that the shipment of arms or munitions of war from countries which produce these commodities may promote or encourage the employment of force in the course of a dispute or conflict between nations, and, after securing the cooperation of such governments as the President deems necessary, he makes proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, or sell for export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country or countries as he may designate, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

SEC. 2. Whoever exports any arms or munitions of war in violation of section 1 shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 2 years, or both.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 2 hours, and the gentleman from New York is recognized for 2 hours.

Mr. FISH. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if we cannot have some understanding with reference to when the committee shall rise this afternoon in accordance with the agreement hitherto made? Cannot we agree to go on, say, until 5 o'clock? With such an agreement we would know better how to yield time this evening.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that the committee rise somewhere between half past 4 and 5 o'clock. We will have plenty of time tomorrow to finish general debate.

Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution is very easy to understand, and I am sure is not as dangerous as many would suggest.

This resolution provides that whenever the President finds that in any part of the world such conditions exist that the shipment of arms or munitions of war from countries which produce these commodities may promote or encourage the employment of force in the settlement of disputes and conflicts between nations, after securing the cooperation of such governments as the President deems necessary he may make it, or declare it, unlawful to export arms to those countries.

This identical bill was recommended very strongly by President Hoover in his message in February. Secretary Stimson appeared before our committee at that time in behalf of this legislation.

It was said by one member of our committee who is also a member of the Committee on Rules on the Republican side that the committee at that time reported this bill out but made it applicable only to American countries. That was true.

It was late in the session and we thought that was the only means by which we could get any legislation of this character before the House, and there was an agreement that the report would be a unanimous report. For this reason alone was the bill reported in that form, because practically every member of that committee at that time stood ready to report this bill as it is reported now.

I am very sorry indeed the Republican members of our committee, notwithstanding the previous recommendation of a Republican President, have undertaken to make this a party question. Each and every one of them voted against the report of this bill except the man who is on the Committee on Rules today and who did not sign even the minority report. These members evidently were influenced by the distinguished gentleman from New York and my renowned friend from Massachusetts, who surrendered the ranking place on the great Committee on Appropriations in order that he could seek new worlds to conquer, be appointed to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and thereby influence international affairs. I must attribute the great change that was made in the attitude of the Republicans to the force of the arguments of the distinguished gentleman, bringing out this bill in that form against their wishes, and making it a party question.

Mr. TINKHAM. May I ask the honorable Representative whether he had confidence in Mr. Hoover and Mr. Stimson during the last session of Congress?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. As to this legislation, I did. As to other legislation, I did not. [Applause.]

You know the distinguished gentleman, my personal friend for whom I have the greatest respect—and this is not meant to be personal—one who has traveled the world time and again and has great knowledge of foreign affairs, my distinguished bewhiskered friend from Massachusetts who by many has been considered in this House for a long number of years as an authority on the liquor question and the "Negro" question, having partially disposed of the great liquor question, now has sought new fields to conquer and has come to the Committee on Foreign Affairs to see that the foreign affairs of this country were run correctly.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I should like the gentleman to carry his thought a little further and explain why he had confidence in President Hoover in only this one instance and not in the many other instances.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Because I agreed with him. [Laughter and applause.] In that matter he was right.

I did not intend to expose the gentleman from Massachusetts. He has never been against this bill. He is not against it today, down in his heart, and he knows it. He would not sign the minority report, but they got him over here on the Rules Committee and forced him before you to make a little speech, and you know it was not very strong as against this resolution. [Applause.] You know I have the greatest respect for him. He is one of the most affable gentlemen on my committee, one of the most valuable. I do not know how I would get along without JOE MARTIN. But I must move on.

This is no new legislation. This is no new remedy. It does not possess the dangerous qualities these great international lawyers would have you think, and it does not take much of a lawyer to see the inaccuracies of their statements. You will see these distinguished gentlemen building up straw men in order to strike them down.

I said this is not new legislation. It is merely a carrying out of such provisions as we have had before.

It has been represented to the committee by some of these eminent lawyers that the pending resolution is opposed to the settled policy of the United States. We have long had legislation on this general subject, and some of our legislation has given the President even broader power than is proposed in the pending resolution.

A joint resolution of Congress approved on April 22, 1898, gave the President the broad power to prohibit the exportation of coal or other material used in war—other material—in his discretion and with such limitations and exceptions as to him seemed expedient.

I presume even the Republican members of my committee did not know that for some 14 years we had a more drastic law in this country giving the President this authority than the present proposed limited authority. While under this resolution the authority of the President is extended to the world, yet it is restricted to certain conditions.

Although the resolution of 1898 became a law shortly after the beginning of the War with Spain, it was in no way limited to the duration of that war and the President's exercise of the conferred power was not limited to times of war. The resolution continued in force without amendment until August 1912. The President acted under it long after the Spanish-American War was ended.

On October 4, 1905, President Roosevelt issued a proclamation, acting under the authority of the resolution of 1890, and as the proclamation stated "for good and sufficient reasons unto me appearing", he forbade the exportation of arms to any port in the Dominican Republic. This shows, I think, that the resolution of 1890 was not a dead letter during the 14 years it remained on our statute books.

In 1912 a resolution was passed by the Congress giving the President, without the consent of other nations, the right to declare an embargo on arms in American countries where domestic troubles existed.

In 1922 this law was amended, and at that time it included all countries in which we have extraterritorial jurisdiction, such as China, Egypt, Morocco, and other foreign countries, and since that time this right has been exercised by the United States and has never been questioned.

Why there is an insinuation here today that the purposes of this resolution are hidden and that it could only be for the purpose, which is evident from the remarks that have been made, of being intended to apply to Japan. This is a fallacy. You know there has been an embargo on arms to China from this country since 1922. It has not created war, and it has been exercised. There was no question then raised about its constitutionality, and there has not been any such question raised during this time.

The same thing is true of Brazil, Mexico, Honduras, Nicaragua, and other countries.

Mr. FISH and Mr. BLOOM rose.

Mr. FISH. I just want to see if I understood the statement of the gentleman. Did the gentleman say there was an embargo on palms or arms?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If the gentleman cannot hear any better what I said and does not know anything more about the facts in this case than that, I consider that remark, coming from the tall pine from New York, practically an insult. I said arms.

Mr. FISH. If the gentleman will yield further, I will apologize for any interpretation of that kind of his remarks. Some Members here asked me whether the gentleman from Tennessee said palms, and I wanted to understand it correctly.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am very sorry I was misunderstood. I do not think anyone who had any reason to want to understand me correctly could have misconstrued my remarks when I said arms. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman might particularize as to that 1922 embargo with respect to why it is in existence now and whether it is by force of law or otherwise.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It was proclaimed under authority of the act of 1922, and this embargo, which was proclaimed on March 4, 1922, is still in effect.

It was proclaimed against Brazil on October 22, 1930, and continued until 1931, and also against Honduras, Mexico, and Nicaragua.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 more minutes.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I am asking this for information, because I have the utmost regard for my chairman, as he knows. Is it a fact that we have an embargo on arms against Japan and have had one for many years?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I did not say Japan, I said China.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman said Japan.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If I said Japan it was not so intended; I meant to say China.

Mr. FISH. That is different.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Because, of course, we have no right to declare an embargo against Japan. I will withdraw that and say China, because that is what I meant. A statement was made in connection with the argument with reference to Japan.

Mr. CONDON. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CONDON. I have listened very attentively to what the gentleman has said about the different countries. Am I to understand that all these instances relate to domestic violence within those countries?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They relate to domestic violence in such countries. The President has not authority to declare an embargo on arms except where there is domestic violence.

Mr. CONDON. In that connection, does not the gentleman recognize a very distinct difference between an embargo upon arms to different countries engaged in warfare and an embargo upon arms into a country where civil war is impending or is actually in progress?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. There is a difference, absolutely, and that is why we want this bill passed. For instance, in South America there is such a condition existing between Paraguay and Bolivia, and yet we cannot stop the shipment of arms, and with the United States considered as a great arms-manufacturing country, it would do no good for other countries to stop the shipment of arms. The same conditions exist between Colombia and Peru.

All the other great nations of the world have this authority, but to make it effective and make it a stroke toward peace it is absolutely necessary that this great country have such power.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman was speaking of South American countries and he meant the authority provided in this resolution.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I meant the authority provided in this resolution.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 minutes. Mr. Speaker, I have the utmost respect and confidence in the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives. I know I express the sentiment of every Republican upon that committee that they not only like him personally but respect him in every way. There will not enter into this debate, as far as we are concerned, any personalities, and as far as most of us are concerned, any partisanship, because I, and several other Republican members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, have consistently opposed the arms-embargo resolution under the Hoover administration as well as today.

Certainly that is not injecting partisanship into this issue. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] and myself and others have consistently opposed the resolution under a Republican administration, because we believed it was against the interest and safety of the United States and led to war.

The partisanship comes from the Democratic side, who have made this a party issue because they have received word from the State Department to jam it through.

Mr. WEST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. WEST. I want to ask the gentleman if the minority report that is signed by the Republican members is a mere coincidence, and that there is no partisan view expressed in the minority report?

Mr. FISH. I do not know to what the gentleman refers.

Mr. WEST. Here is a minority report against the resolution which is signed by all the Republican members of the committee.

Mr. FISH. Of course, the Republican members of the committee oppose it. Most of us, including the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] and the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], have opposed it right along. It is the Democrats who have reversed themselves and now support the legislation as a party proposition and attempt to rush it through without even an opportunity to offer amendments.

Just before the War with Spain we empowered the President to lay an embargo on coal, so that coal, and possibly other things, could not be used by Spain against ourselves when we were about to declare war against Spain.

It was not until 1912 that the Root resolution was adopted in the Congress of the United States. It gave the President the power, whenever there were internal disturbances in American countries, to place an arms embargo, and that is law today. That was amended in 1922 to apply to countries where we have extraterritorial rights, as in China, Egypt, and Abyssinia.

This is an entirely new, novel, and dangerous proposition giving the President of the United States the power to lay an embargo against belligerents or nations on the verge of war and determine who is the aggressor nation.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Not just now. I stated when I spoke on the rule that we propose to take the veil off this issue, that we propose to prove the statements that we made as to the aggressor proposition, to prove that this is the entrance into the League of Nations for the enforcement of articles X and XVI, and we propose to do that by the facts, and we will present them to you. We also propose to show you that it is the utter destruction of our traditional policy of neutrality, the cornerstone of our foreign policy for over 140 years. Nobody disputes that. I do not believe there is a Democrat who disputes the fact that this throws the whole neutrality policy of the United States out of the window.

Mr. BLACK. I dispute it.

Mr. BLOOM. I dispute it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I do not yield.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman does not dare yield.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman will have ample opportunity in his own time, but not in mine.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the point of order?

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman made a statement asking if there was anyone who would dare dispute the fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman say that he wants to have his facts disputed?

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman must not be interrupted. He has the floor.

Mr. BLOOM. But I did not interrupt the gentleman. He called for an interruption and I make the point of order against that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Even if his call has been accepted, he now declines to yield.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I hope this interruption will not be taken out of my time. I repeat my challenge, and any Democrat in his own time—they will have plenty of time, we have some 4 hours of debate—can show if he can wherein this embargo resolution does not destroy our entire neutrality policy laid down by George Washington and Thomas Jefferson, and adhered to by every President, Republican and Democratic alike, including Woodrow Wilson, and every Secretary of State. That is the challenge that I offer to any Democrat here in his own time, and as long as he wants in his own time; he can go just as far as he likes, but he will not make much progress against the unanswerable statement of Judge John Bassett Moore, contained in the minority report that this resolution is the death knell of American neutrality.

So that there will be no misunderstanding, it might be well to present the original proclamation of neutrality as promulgated by George Washington, which I shall do in my time. It is very brief, and I shall include it in the RECORD. It is the proclamation of neutrality issued in 1793, at a time when France and Great Britain were at war. It is the fundamental policy of the United States and has been ever since that time.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman put that into the RECORD?

Mr. FISH. Yes. I ask unanimous consent to include George Washington's neutrality proclamation in my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to state that I think that all matters concerning George Washington should be inserted under the name of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, A PROCLAMATION

Whereas it appears that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands, of the one part, and France on the other; and the duty and interest of the United States require that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers:

I have therefore thought fit by these presents to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid toward those powers respectively, and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition.

And I do hereby also make known that whosoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the said powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations, will not receive the protection of the United States against such punishment or forfeiture; and, further, that I have given instructions to those officers, to whom it belongs, to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons who shall, within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, violate the law of nations, with respect to the powers at war, or any of them.

In testimony whereof I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand.

Done at the city of Philadelphia, the 22d day of April 1793, and of the independence of the United States of America the seventeenth.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

By the President:
TH. JEFFERSON.

Mr. WEST. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one question for information?

Mr. FISH. Not just now. I think I made it plain that some of us were opposed to this resolution under the recent Republican administration.

Mr. WEST. This is a question of information.

Mr. FISH. I am sorry, but I cannot yield. In view of the fact that we are talking about George Washington and Thomas Jefferson, let us go back and see what the early founders of our Republic had to say about the war power. I think most of us will admit that when we give the President the power to cooperate with other nations to lay embargoes against a single nation, that that is an unneutral and a hostile act and gives the President the power to drag us into war. What did the early founders of the Republic say about the war powers?

According to the records of the Federal Convention as set forth by Madison in his notes on August 17, 1787—

Mr. Gerry said he never expected to hear in a republic a motion to empower the Executive alone to declare war. Mr. Madison was against giving the power to the Executive because he should not be entrusted with it, or to the Senate because it was not so constructed as to be entitled to it. He was for clogging rather than for facilitating war.

That expresses the real opposition to this proposal. There are many of us who want to clog the right to declare war and not make it easier by handing it over to an individual. I represent the district from which the present President of the United States comes. I have known him for 20 years or more. I have the highest personal and political regard for him. I believe he can be trusted. I believe he is a man of caution and patriotism, but we should not take away from the Congress the right to declare war or to lay embargoes and place those powers in the hands of any individual, no matter whether he be in the White House for 4 or 8 years. We seek to clog the right to declare war. There are some Members of this Congress who favor a referendum on war in order to slow up the process of declaring war.

There has been advocated on the floor of this House, and resolutions have been introduced so that the people would have some say, and now the Representatives of the people in the Congress, through the Democratic Party, that so-called "progressive party", seek to give this autocratic and despotic power to a single man, to join with other nations to determine the aggressor nation, an unneutral and hostile act, that will eventuate in war. In all history no nation has yet been declared an aggressor nation. Let us mind our own business and refrain from passing moral judgments on other nations in Europe and Asia and stop this dangerous policy of trying to police Manchuria or any other far-off foreign nation, particularly when we have so many troubles to attend to at home.

Historians are still disputing as to who started the World War. Ever since 1793, when Washington issued his proclamation of neutrality, no historian has ever found out who was the aggressor nation in any of the numerous relatively modern wars.

Now, let us take the veil from this proposal. What is the demand for it at the present moment? As far as I know, there is just one reason, and that is to go in with the League of Nations, with the Advisory Committee of the League of Nations, to declare an embargo against Japan, as the aggressor nation in the Far East, and have the United States declare that embargo, with those European nations, against Japan. But suppose Japan very properly resents this embargo placed by the United States? Let us assume she retaliates, as she probably would, and an American vessel is seized, and our national honor is impugned and we are forced, against the will of the American people, to declare war, does any sensible man believe that any of those European nations who may go along with us in the embargo, are going to fight for us? That is the main reason I am opposed to this proposed arms embargo, because I am opposed to anything which directly or indirectly involves us in the Manchurian dispute or will get us into war without our own consent, except on the basis of national defense. If we are involved in war, does any Representative in this Congress think that France or England or Czechoslovakia and the other munition countries will help us in the fighting?

To use a provincial expression, we shall be holding the bag and we shall be called upon to do all the fighting. We shall be called upon to send ships and American soldiers. It is time we stopped trying to police Manchuria and the rest of the world. It is time we ceased trying to determine who is the aggressor nation, and being forced into the League of Nations, not through the back door but through the front door, to carry out the mandates of the Advisory Committee, that is even now talking about embargoes and against Japan. If you do not believe this is a League of Nations proposition, listen to this letter. This is only one of numerous letters with which Congress is being flooded, and this is from the head-master of Gunnery School, at Washington, Conn. I do not know the gentleman, but he writes me as follows:

DEAR MR. FISH: If I am correctly informed, there is a bill before the Senate and House of Representatives to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions from the United States of America under certain conditions which would empower the President, when he deems it necessary, to declare by proclamation the export or sale of arms unlawful. The local organization of the League of Nations Association has suggested that those interested in the passage of this bill and favoring this principle register their approval with their representatives in Washington. May I therefore express to you—

And then he goes on to express his support of the bill.

The proponents of this bill and those who are flooding Congress with such propaganda represent League of Nations organizations, and I think it is only a fair proposition, as far as voting on this resolution is concerned, that those who favor the League of Nations shall support the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLIVER of New York). The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

This is a League of Nations resolution without any disguise. It aims to enforce those vicious provisions, articles X and XVI, the ones which were repudiated, the very ones which were discussed throughout this country and rejected, providing for the use of American soldiers to maintain the territorial status quo of the peace treaties and to enforce sanctions and embargoes against aggressor nations.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No. I am sorry, but I do not have much time left.

I submit to the Republican side of the House, if there are Republicans who are in favor of the League of Nations, I hope they will vote for this resolution. There is no other way about it. It is an out-and-out League of Nations proposition, but of the very worst kind. As one who believes in peace and peaceful relations in the world, I admit there is much good in the League, but these are two of its worst provisions. These are the enforcement provisions, providing for sending troops and ships and determining who is the aggressor nation.

Now, as far as the views of the President are concerned, I want to be fair with the President of the United States, who is as much my President as yours. I want to be fair with him, but I must confess I am somewhat troubled with a statement included in a recent Associated Press report. I hope the President was misquoted when he was reported as follows:

I have long been in favor of the use of embargoes on arms to belligerent nations, especially to nations which are guilty of making an attack on other nations; that is, against aggressor nations.

That is a statement which, up to this time, has not been denied. The President of the United States says he favors determining the aggressor nation. Naturally, if that is so, he wants this power. The power to do what? To go in with the League of Nations, with the Advisory Committee of the League of Nations, that is now discussing and determining the far-eastern situation, to apply an embargo against Japan.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No; I do not yield. The gentleman will have plenty of time.

Mr. BLOOM. I just wanted to correct the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. If the gentleman speaks for the President, I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. I want to correct the gentleman if he will give me a chance.

Mr. FISH. No; I do not yield to the gentleman at all.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; certainly.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Has not the gentleman some private information that would cause him to doubt such a statement as he has just made?

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman refer to the statement I just read?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. No; I am speaking about Japan.

Mr. FISH. I may say to the gentleman, and I want all the House to listen to this, of course, the State Department is doing everything in its power to say, "Oh, this has nothing to do with the Japanese-Chinese situation."

At the same time, every American and every Japanese and every member of the League of Nations know perfectly well the reason for this resolution, for this proposed arms embargo. It has been suggested by the British Government. It has been likewise suggested by the Advisory Committee of the League of Nations.

Against whom is it aimed? Is it aimed against Cuba or Nicaragua or South America? It is aimed against one nation—the nation the League of Nations has already said was an aggressor nation. And I shall read from the report.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 7 minutes more.

This is a wireless to the New York Times:

GENEVA, March 14.

The Advisory Committee of 21 meet tomorrow afternoon and it is certain to accept American cooperation on the basis suggested by Secretary Hull.

After acknowledging receipt of Moscow's refusal to cooperate at present, the committee will admit Hugh R. Wilson to its meeting, which will be private. It will then continue its discussion of a proposal for an arms embargo in the Far East.

Not an embargo against some little country, not an embargo against some European country, but against one of the greatest naval powers in the world; and I want to point out to you Democrats that, as far as one Republican is concerned, there is no partisanship when it comes to embroiling us in war with Japan. I have opposed it before—and will continue to do so—as a dangerous and warlike proposal. It is a wolf in sheep's clothing. I have opposed the futile and puerile sending of notes by the Republican administration to Japan every time they moved a soldier in Manchuria. It merely bewildered and irritated the Japanese at first, but it finally succeeded in inflamed Japanese public opinion. It is time we ceased to be an international nuisance, mind our own business, and stop policing foreign lands. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is it not true that in the consideration of this bill at the last session of Congress, when the gentleman says he opposed it, he stated he would go along and report this bill out if there were added thereto an amendment in reference to disarmament and which was a direction to the Geneva Conference?

Mr. FISH. I am glad the gentleman raised this issue. I go much farther than this pending arms embargo, provided our neutrality can be preserved.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is not that true?

Mr. FISH. I will explain it, and out of my own time, too. I go much farther than this proposition. I introduced in the Committee on Foreign Affairs—and they had a Democratic majority—a resolution to place a multilateral embargo on arms among all nations so that all nations would refuse to sell arms and munitions of war. It was reported out of the committee by a vote of 15 to 2. It goes far beyond this resolution but maintains our traditional policy of neutrality and is a step toward peace.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that if the pending resolution for an embargo on arms were presented to the American people without explanation and interpretation they would be for it overwhelmingly. But I say to you that if the American people knew the facts we are trying to bring out, that this is an aggressor-nation proposition that puts us into the League of Nations, they would be 90 percent against it as constituting an unneutral and hostile act that would drag us into every war.

When it first came up, advocated by Mr. Hoover, the President at that time, and his Secretary of State, some of us were not sure ourselves what it all meant—when it was first brought into our committee.

But when we began to study it and understood this proposition, we were against it; we were just 100 percent against it in every possible way. That is how we Republicans feel. Knowing that if you make it, as you have, a party matter you can carry it through 3 to 1 in this House, no matter if there were no other voice or no other vote, I for one would oppose this resolution all the way through as being an act of war and not an act of peace. This is my answer to the gentleman from Tennessee.

As to the other proposition, I wish his party would support a resolution providing for a multilateral treaty or agreement among all nations not to sell any munitions of war. That is in accordance with the Briand-Kellogg Pact to renounce war as an instrument of national policy except for purposes of defense. This does just what Mr. Kellogg repeatedly said should not be done. He said there should be no teeth put into the Briand-Kellogg Pact; that there were no sanctions and no embargoes; that it was a mere declaration of policy not to resort to war until every effort at arbitration had failed, and then only in self-defense. I believe in it as a powerful deterrent against war as an illegal institution. The same thing is said also by Mr. Salmon O. Levinson, who is probably the instigator of the Briand-Kellogg Pact. I have a letter from him. He opposes this resolution. I shall ask unanimous consent later on to incorporate his letter in my remarks.

Also, this resolution puts teeth, puts compulsion, puts armed force into the Kellogg Pact to determine the aggressor nation the world over and will involve us into every foreign intrigue, every foreign broil and combat that occurs because the League of Nations and other leading nations will go to the President and say to him: "You have this power now and if you do not come in with us, you are not cooperating, you are doing a cowardly act. You have the power now to lay embargoes and to come in with us and say who is the aggressor nation."

In the particular case, aimed as it is against no other nation except Japan at the present time, there is not a single nation in the world that would raise its hands if we were forced into war by this dangerous and revolutionary embargo; and I say to you Democrats, I hope at least some of you will read John Bassett Moore's letter to our committee. He is the foremost international lawyer in the world, a former member of the World Court, a man who has devoted his entire time to international law.

This resolution presages the destruction of the traditional neutrality policy of the United States. I hope the Democrats will try to answer Judge Moore's statement in their own time. [Applause.]

CHICAGO, March 27, 1933.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FISH: Your telegram received. The fundamental question of private manufacture and sale of munitions and armaments (largely confined to six nations, including our own) is unsettled and needs international agreement. Until this is settled all embargo proposals are rendered difficult, unsatisfactory, and ineffective. However tempting it may be to decree some legislatively concrete action in a crisis, there are, in my view, at least two serious obstacles to be considered: First, deciding which of two countries involved in a quarrel is the aggressor, which is always a complicated and dangerous question; or alternatively embargoing both nations, which automatically renders aid to the stronger; and, if done in 1915, would undoubtedly have won the World War for Germany; and, secondly, the grotesque and perilous situation our country would find itself in if the declared embargo in and of itself did not stop hostilities. For in such event, if we designated and embargoed the aggressor, we would either be cowardly and quit or we would press on with greater mechanisms of compulsion and force ending in the actuality of war. Some way should be found to get effective control of the manufacture and sale of all arms to sovereign hands with agreement among the nations to supply basic needs of the nations for reasonable defense and internal order. Moreover, taking sides by embargo of alleged aggressor in South America would knock the Monroe Doctrine into a cocked hat; and not taking sides, for example, as between Peru and Colombia, but treating them both as equally wrong, would be morally inexcusable. I have no patented or other panacea, but believe as time goes on the peace pact, which has been signed by the governments, will be enforced by the peoples of the world who are overwhelmingly against war, whose ungodly penalties they alone pay.

Sincerely yours,

SALMON O. LEVINSON.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEST].

Mr. WEST. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from New York, my good friend who has just spoken, has very eloquently told you that he wishes to draw back the veil in order that we might see what is back of the arms-embargo resolution. It is very gratifying to me to see this effort made to view our international relations objectively, dispassionately, and without prejudice. American foreign policies should rest upon a recognition of the underlying facts of our international relationships.

Since the gentleman has suggested that we draw back the veil in order to ascertain the facts in connection with this proposal, it is entirely proper for us to draw the veil back far enough to see just what is back of one of the statements in the letter that was read during the course of his argument. It is the contention of the gentleman that the adoption of this resolution is the first step toward a surreptitious entrance into the League of Nations.

The basis for this assertion is found in a statement contained in a letter from Hamilton Gibson. In order to identify the author of the statement I find upon examination that this argument with reference to the League of Nations comes from a gentleman from the Gunnery School of Washington, Conn., and is written upon the letterhead of that institution. This revelation seems to me to be highly significant in indicating something of the source of the information upon which an argument of the opposition is based.

The assertion has been made by the gentleman who has preceded me in this debate that he is not only opposed to this proposition now but he has always been opposed to it. My recollection is quite definite, however, that when this resolution was before the Foreign Affairs Committee during the last session that the gentleman agreed to this proposal in principle, provided it was limited so as to apply merely to American countries. Moreover, in a previous consideration of this same proposal of an arms embargo the gentleman was entirely willing to accept the principles of the resolution in connection with the effort that was made to instruct the American delegates to the Disarmament Conference to work for the adoption of a multilateral treaty embodying such principles.

In view of this earlier attitude of favor on the part of the gentleman toward this resolution, it is not at all an unwarranted conclusion that his present opposition might be dictated by considerations of political expediency and that he really believes in the principle of an arms embargo.

Mr. FISH. I still agree so far as American countries are concerned.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST. I am very glad to yield to the able and distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Was there any exception as to any country, when the gentleman agreed to this, if we added that other provision?

Mr. WEST. There was no exception, according to my understanding.

Mr. FISH. I think I have already explained that proposition pretty carefully.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. May I suggest that the gentleman proceed and let the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] explain in his own time. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEST. That arrangement is entirely acceptable to me.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. WEST. Yes, indeed, sir.

Mr. LOZIER. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] concedes that he favors this principle when applied to Latin American nations, does he not destroy the force and consistency of his entire argument?

Mr. WEST. It certainly seems to me that he does. In my opinion if a proposal is sound in principle and acceptable for limited application it is likewise sound and valid when it is more widely extended or when given a more general application. [Applause.]

During the course of this debate it has been charged by the opposition that the grant of this power to the President will mean that the authority thus conferred will be abused to precipitate war. The assertion is frequently made that an arms embargo would enable the President to lead the country into war in violation of the constitutional prerogative of Congress with reference to the declaration of war. It is quite true indeed that an unwise and unwarranted exercise of the power conferred by this resolution might under certain circumstances lead to war. But the same thing might properly be said regarding any power now possessed by the President.

At the present time the power of the President in the control of foreign policy, in his control over our diplomatic correspondence, and in his determination of our international relationships, exercises an authority which if abused might lead to disputes with other nations that would place upon Congress the responsibility for declaring war. As Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy the Chief Executive can always lead us into situations through naval demonstrations or unwarranted exercise of this power that might easily lead to a situation which would precipitate war. But this does not mean that the President can declare war. This power, under the Constitution, must always remain with Congress. But to deny to the President a power which can be employed constructively with such beneficial effect in the promotion of peaceful relations among the states of the world simply upon the ground that the power might be abused is utterly unwarranted and is inconsistent with the integrity of our political institutions and the high character of the Chief Executive of this Nation.

For my part I am entirely willing to place this power in the hands of the President of this country with implicit confidence and faith in his integrity to use this power along with every other power at his command to direct the affairs of this Nation in such fashion as to establish and maintain peaceful relationships with other nations in full accord with the traditional policies of our country. [Applause.]

More than ever am I encouraged to grant this power to the President in view of the courageous action of the present Chief Executive in meeting the crisis in our Nation's affairs. The chief product of the constructive and statesmanlike program of our President has been the great revival of confidence on the part of our people in the basic integrity of our political and financial institutions. That priceless public confidence must be maintained unimpaired until the President has been able to complete his program and bring this country out of this depression into a happier and more prosperous condition. Nothing would be more wholesome and stimulating at this time than to establish the same confidence among other peoples of the world in the stability and security of international institutions in promoting and safeguarding peaceful relationships among nations. The adoption of this resolution would place in the hands of the President the power to accomplish this great purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Can the gentleman give us any assurance that the President will not place any embargo on arms going to Japan?

Mr. WEST. The use of this agency, of course, will depend upon the facts in regard to any given situation. Naturally no prophecy can be made with reference to any specific use of the embargo in the future. But as I have just said, I have absolute confidence in the integrity of the President of the United States. There is no doubt whatsoever in my mind that in any given situation this power will be used wisely and justly and in full accord with our established American principles with reference to international affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. WEST. I shall be glad to.

Mr. TINKHAM. Does the honorable Representative believe that war should be prevented by making war?

Mr. WEST. The course pursued or the agency adopted in any given case to prevent war depends upon the facts of that particular case. In this instance the gentleman is assuming that this agency of the arms embargo is an act of war, and that in this way we use war to prevent war. But such an assumption is unwarranted and unjustified upon the basis of the international law of neutrality. The assertions of the gentleman of the opposition are based upon an unwarranted interpretation of the principles of international law.

If this arms-embargo power is used in time of peace, there is no question whatsoever in regard to a violation of the law of neutrality. The neutral relationship exists only when there is a state of war. Neutrality begins only when there is a relation of belligerency between two or more powers. When peaceful relations obtain between states, there is no question of neutrality, and hence the use of the embargo at such a time can in no manner be considered hostile nor unneutral.

Since the World War, the international law of neutrality has been considerably modified by the adoption of international conventions which have altered the former relationships existing among states. The Covenant of the League of Nations, the protocol establishing the Permanent Court of International Justice, and the Kellogg-Briand Pact for the renunciation of war as a national policy have all established new relationships among the nations and have greatly modified the principles of neutrality. Under present conditions nations engage in various forms of conflict under the guise of pacific reprisal, and since war does not exist neutrality does not obtain. It is possible in this manner to adopt a course of aggression and label it pacific reprisal, and the other nations of the world are powerless to interfere in the interests of peace and justice and have applied the principles of international law which should operate.

Mr. TINKHAM. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. WEST. Yes.

Mr. TINKHAM. Is the honorable Representative in favor of the United States' entering the League of Nations?

Mr. WEST. Of course, the gentleman understands that he is simply asking me for my personal views and that this question has no bearing at all on the merits of the question at issue, which is the adoption of the arms-embargo resolution. The decision with reference to the adoption of this resolution must rest upon the merits of the proposal itself.

But I am very glad to inform the gentleman frankly of my own personal opinion regarding the League of Nations since he is interested in knowing it, which is, that I favor both the League of Nations and the World Court and other international organizations which exist for the promotion and maintenance of peaceful relations among nations.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has sought, however, to discredit this resolution before us by endeavoring to put on it the label of the League of Nations. Knowing that in some quarters there is a prejudice against the League of Nations, he tries to direct that same prejudice to this proposal. But, of course, it is perfectly clear that you cannot answer an argument in favor of a proposal simply by calling it names or attaching a label to it. Again I say that the decision with reference to this resolution must be based upon the merits of the proposal itself.

Since the League of Nations has entered into this discussion, may I say that there is not only prejudice with reference to this institution but lack of understanding regarding its true nature. The League is not a state, does not possess sovereignty, and exists merely as a new agency for handling international business. It is a new system designed to take the place of the old devices of diplomacy and to be representative of the various viewpoints of the member states. It takes no action of itself in connection with major issues, but when broad international action is taken on vital questions the decisions of the League are embodied in treaty agreements which are ratified by the member states. The League's action is wise or unwise depending upon the wisdom of the concerted action of its members. It can truthfully be said that the League at any given time simply reflects the maximum amount of cooperation which exists in the world with reference to any given course, and is simply the device used by the nations to make their agreements effective.

But in this discussion let me make myself perfectly clear in regard to the question of the League in this argument. This viewpoint is merely my own, given in reply to a direct question, and is not the position of the committee. The gentleman of the opposition has, by bringing up the subject of the League, sought to divert our attention from the main point at issue. The adoption of the arms-embargo resolution is in no sense whatsoever a step toward entrance into the League, and the conclusions and arguments of the gentleman with respect to this are totally unwarranted.

At the present time the United States is cooperating with other nations in many ways for the accomplishment of many different purposes, sometimes through the agencies of the League and sometimes without. The proposal before us today is nothing more than an authorization of power to the President to enable him more completely and faithfully to work out a course of action in conjunction with other nations that will be fully in accord with our traditional American foreign policies.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman state who appeared before the committee in opposition to this resolution?

Mr. WEST. Statements in opposition were made by John Bassett Moore and Dr. Borchard, of Yale.

Mr. BRIGGS. And was that the only testimony in opposition?

Mr. WEST. I will defer to my colleague to answer that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Did not the munition manufacturers of Connecticut appear in opposition to it?

Mr. WEST. Yes, indeed; the munitions makers appeared in opposition. The favorable testimony came from groups all over the country from representative organizations, and those in opposition rested on the statements by representatives of the munition manufacturers, and their testimony, from my recollection, was not only inaccurate but unsound and was based upon lack of information in regard to the whole traffic in arms.

Mr. MOTT. May I inquire of the gentleman whether the witnesses who appeared before the committee and supported this proposal were supporting the general principle embodied in the resolution or this particular resolution?

Mr. WEST. The hearings were on this particular resolution.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask another question? Why is it necessary to give this authority to the President to decide when such an embargo shall be put into effect, rather than to allow the Congress to decide that after the President might notify the Congress as to his findings on the proposition?

Mr. WEST. The power to declare this embargo exists in the government of every important arms-producing country, with the exception, as I understand, of Czechoslovakia. Authorities maintain that this power does exist now in the President's control of international affairs, that that President could in cooperation with other nations, adopt a course of action, embody it in a treaty, and have the treaty referred to the Senate for confirmation. You would, of course, get this result.

This resolution simplifies the procedure. Congress is taking this step of directing the course of the President along a certain line, subject, however, to conditions to be met, first, that there shall exist in the world a condition which threatens peace, and the cooperation of the other nations producing arms. This course goes into effect when other nations agree with the President to act in unison in any given situation. That course does not necessarily rest upon treaty agreement. We have the various Executive agreements that have been adopted in times past that have permitted unified action by nations not on the basis of treaty. There is nothing that transcends the Constitution in this provision. It is merely directing the course of the President along this line to make it possible for him to act immediately in cooperation with other nations.

Mr. MOTT. There is nothing in this resolution, however, providing for ratification by Congress of the action of the President, is there?

Mr. WEST. Such action is unnecessary if there is no treaty engagement undertaken in connection with it. It is merely an understanding, an Executive agreement, and we have numerous instances of that that could be presented to show that he can act on the basis of this.

Mr. BLOOM. And Congress could revoke it at any time.

Mr. WEST. That is true.

Mr. FREAR. And the gentleman presumes that Congress is always in session. If it is not, the President would have to call Congress into session from all parts of the country to determine whether or not this action should be taken.

Mr. WEST. That is the case. This resolution gives the President the power to use when Congress is not in session. Our distinguished friends of the opposition base their case with reference to neutrality on the testimony of John Bassett Moore. I yield to no one in my admiration for the great work of John Bassett Moore, a great international lawyer. Fifteen or twenty years ago I first read international law from his Digest. I have the greatest respect for the great mind of John Bassett Moore in the field of international law. I also have respect for Professor Borchard, his disciple, who follows out his program and defends the work and views of John Bassett Moore.

But let me say this: The ideas of John Bassett Moore with reference to neutrality crystallized in 1907, when they were embodied in his great work and when they were embodied in the Hague Convention of that year, and later in the declaration of London. He has not taken into account the developments in international law during and since the World War. Let me read you a statement from our distinguished Democratic leader during the World War, President Wilson. In an address at Cincinnati on October 26, 1916, President Wilson said:

> This is the last war of any kind that involves the world that the United States can keep out of. I say this because I believe the business of neutrality is over, not because I want it to be over but I mean this, that war now has such a scale that the position of neutrals sooner or later becomes intolerable.

Dr. Hershey, in commenting on this statement, says:

No doubt the role and scope of neutrality in future wars will be much reduced and the character of neutral rights and duties will be greatly modified. But it is impossible to foresee what course this development will take. It may, however, not be too hazardous to predict that in a war waged under the auspices of a powerful League, the freedom of the seas will hardly be respected, even to the extent that has been the case in the past, and the forces cooperating to protect the covenants of the League will not hesitate to cross land frontiers of members of the League, more particularly in view of their obligations under XVI of the Covenant.

That old doctrine of neutrality ended in the last war; and since the World War, agencies have been set up in international affairs to make any question of international dispute a matter of concern to other nations of the world, it is now highly important that we give to the President every agency we can to enable him to cope with the new situation.

My friends, it is now nearly 20 years since the beginning of the World War, nearly a generation. Prior to that time for many years nations made investments in the business of war. In my judgment, it is now time that we reverse this procedure and begin to make investments in the business of peace. The adoption of this arms-embargo resolution is a step toward this worthy purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes, and then, I understand, the gentleman from Tennessee will move to adjourn.

I did not want to interrupt my colleague; but when he said I favored using this embargo against American countries and that was exactly the same principle, I wish to call attention to the fact that we still have the Monroe Doctrine, and that certainly we have moral obligations toward South American and Central American countries. The President already has the power to place an embargo in American countries where there is domestic violence. I am ready and willing and glad to vote for any proposition to extend that power to American countries that are on the verge of war or actual belligerents in view of the Monroe Doctrine, in view of our geographical situation, and our moral obligations; but more than that, I believe we must first consider the interests, the welfare, and safety of America first, and we do not jeopardize our interests, or our welfare, or our safety if we apply this resolution solely to American countries.

Now, I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEST], who has just finished an able address and who is, as he states, friendly to the League of Nations, that he did interpret very properly the position of those who are in favor of this embargo, and that is, that it totally scraps the fundamental and time-honored neutrality laws and policy of the United States. That was the question I raised. The gentleman admitted it in his speech, that in effect it destroys our traditional policy of neutrality, and I have yet to hear from any Democrat who denies the contention of John Bassett Moore that this embargo resolution is the end to American neutrality.

Mr. Speaker, as far as we are concerned, we have concluded for this afternoon.

REFINANCING SMALL-HOME-OWNER MORTGAGES (H.DOC. NO. 19)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

As a further and urgently necessary step in the program to promote economic recovery, I ask the Congress for legislation to protect small-home owners from foreclosure and to relieve them of a portion of the burden of excessive interest and principal payments incurred during the period of higher values and higher earning power.

Implicit in the legislation which I am suggesting to you is a declaration of national policy. This policy is that the broad interests of the Nation require that special safeguards should be thrown around home ownership as a guaranty of social and economic stability, and that to protect home owners from inequitable enforced liquidation, in a time of general distress is a proper concern of the Government.

The legislation I propose follows the general lines of the farm mortgage refinancing bill. The terms are such as to impose the least possible charge upon the National Treasury consistent with the objects sought. It provides machinery through which existing mortgage debts on small homes may be adjusted to a sound basis of values without injustice to investors at substantially lower interest rates and with provision for postponing both interest and principal payments in cases of extreme need. The resources to be made available through a bond issue to be guaranteed as to interest only by the Treasury will, it is thought, be sufficient to meet the needs of those to whom other methods of financing are not available. At the same time the plan of settlement will provide a standard which should put an end to present uncertain and chaotic conditions that create fear and despair among both home owners and investors.

Legislation of this character is a subject that demands our most earnest, thoughtful, and prompt consideration.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 13, 1933.

HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following statement by the House Office Building Commission, which was read:

ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL,
Washington, D.C., April 13, 1933.

NEW HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING

The Members of the House will no doubt be interested in certain facts relative to the New House Office Building.

Public No. 648, Seventieth Congress, approved January 10, 1929, authorized for the site and construction of the New House Office Building $8,400,000. Of this authorized amount, $7,560,000 was the authorized limit of cost for the building.

The site cost $1,077,745.74 and the cost of the building, estimated as of this date, is $6,280,254, an anticipated saving under the authorized limit of cost for site and building of $1,042,000.

The original authorization did not include furnishings. However, the Congress, in Public No. 5, Seventy-second Congress, approved February 2, 1932, authorized the expenditure of not to exceed $400,000, to be included in the authorized limit of cost for building and site, for this purpose. In view of the low prices obtaining it was possible to secure the furnishings for approximately $228,000.

To summarize, the site was secured, the building provided, and completely furnished for $814,000 less than the authorized limit of cost of the entire project.

The extras involved in the construction of this building amount to less than one half of 1 per cent of the total cost of construction, which is considered to be highly satisfactory.

We consider it only fair, however, that the House should be informed that certain items of furnishings have not been provided which the House may deem of sufficient importance to give consideration to in the immediate future. The fixed seats in the assembly room, which provides a seating capacity for 400, have been omitted. Also the barber shop has not been completely equipped.

We are pleased to inform the Members of the House that the new office building will be ready for occupancy on April 20, 1933, and it is proposed to move Members' effects into this building immediately after the 20th of this month, moves to be made on the basis of seniority. The building provides two hundred and fifty-one 2-room suites of offices, 12 committee rooms, and 1 assembly room.

The square immediately west of the new building has been graded, and arrangements are under way to provide parking space for cars of Members occupying the present and new building.

House Concurrent Resolution 27

Whereas the Congress of the United States has authorized the President to revise all appropriations for the operation of the Federal Government; and

Whereas information has been received that in such revisions there is a possibility that all Federal aid to the States be discontinued; and

Whereas if such Federal aid were discontinued such action would seriously impair, and possibly eliminate, some important functions of State government in the State of Delaware; and

Whereas these said functions are of vital concern to the agriculture of the State of Delaware, inasmuch as elimination of all Federal aid for experiment stations would probably cause the closing of the agricultural experiment station of the State of Delaware; elimination of Federal aid for cooperative extension work in agriculture and home economics would cause the disintegration of that work; the elimination of Federal grants for education in agriculture and mechanic arts would probably result in the abolishment of the School of Agriculture in the University of Delaware; and elimination of all Federal grants for vocational agriculture would seriously cripple the vocational school work in the State; and

Whereas the agricultural population would be deprived of all assistance, guidance, and instruction in their farming operations at a time when such assistance, guidance, and instruction is of paramount importance to their welfare; and

Whereas the State of Delaware is financially unable to replace Federal grants in aid by State funds: Be it

Resolved, That we, the General Assembly of the State of Delaware, do hereby petition and implore Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United State, that complete elimination of Federal grants to States for teaching, research, and extension work in agriculture does not take place. We petition that the President of the United States give serious consideration to the fact that abolishment of all Federal grants to the States might result in destroying the School of Agriculture of the University of Delaware and the cessation of all its functions, including research, experimentation, extension work, and collegiate instruction in the science and art of agriculture, and that the elimination of aid from the School of Agriculture of the University of Delaware would work an undue hardship upon farmers and the agricultural industry of Delaware.

That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and to each United States Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of Delaware.

BANKING, CURRENCY, AND SILVER PROBLEMS

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the disturbed economic conditions have resulted in numerous memorials, resolutions, and other communications designed to advise the Congress of the judgment of different citizens on remedies to be applied by Federal legislation. Such communications are entitled to suitable reference and record. Accordingly, I send to the desk and ask to have placed in the RECORD and appropriately referred two joint memorials of the Colorado Legislature, one on farm conditions and the other with respect to the production of nonmetallic minerals; a petition of some 66 citizens of Boone, Colo., on banking and currency problems, and resolutions on the remonetization of silver received, respectively, from the council of the city and county of Denver, the Junior Chamber of Commerce of Boulder, and the Montrose County Chamber of Commerce, of Montrose, Colo.

There being no objection, the memorials, resolutions, etc., presented by Mr. COSTIGAN, were received, ordered to be noted in the RECORD, and referred as follows:

To the Committee on Appropriations:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, favoring the making of appropriations for the Mineral Leasing Division of the United States Geological Survey sufficient to enable the division to function efficiently for the protection of the oil, gas, coal, and nonmetallic mineral resources of the Western States. (See joint memorial printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 10th instant, p. 1408, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

To the Committee on Banking and Currency:

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, favoring the passage of the so-called "Frazier farm relief bill" for the refinancing of farm mortgages. (See joint memorial printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on Feb. 27, 1933, p. 5065. CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 72d Cong., 2d sess.);

A petition of sundry citizens of Boone, Colo., praying for the retirement, by graduated tax, of all private bank notes emitted by private corporations and circulated as currency, and the issuance in their stead of United States notes in amounts sufficient for the useful ends of a representative currency, and the establishment of United States banks as banks of deposit and exchange for the transaction of the business of the people, to the end that the Government shall have and maintain absolute control over the issue and circulation of the medium of exchange;

A resolution of the mayor and Board of Councilmen of the City and County of Denver, Colo., favoring the passage of legislation providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver on a correct ratio with gold;

A resolution of the Boulder (Colo.) Junior Chamber of Commerce, favoring the passage of legislation remonetizing silver at a ratio of not less than 30 to 1 in its relationship to gold, and the establishment of silver currency as legal tender; and

A resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Montrose, Colo., favoring the passage of legislation to secure a larger use of silver in the monetary system on the basis of the present ratio of coinage.

6-HOUR DAY AND 5-DAY WEEK

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I present and ask to have inserted in the RECORD a telegram from the Idaho Mining Association relative to the so-called "30-hour week bill", and ask that it be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WALLACE, IDAHO, April 14, 1933.

Senator WILLIAM E. BORAH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

I am mailing to you and to the other Idaho representatives in Congress and to Secretary of Labor Perkins a protest against what we understand to be the provisions of the bill presented by Senator BLACK, of Alabama, providing for a 30-hour week and a 6-hour daily shift in industry, which would include mining. We are not objecting to the 30- or 32-hour week, but we are objecting to the establishment of a 6-hour day, which would result in very substantial increase in operating cost, especially in those branches of the mining industry which are carried on 24-hour basis. These industries are now operating without profit and for the benefit of the community, consequently to the injury of the owner. A 6-hour day would necessarily result in a very substantial reduction in the daily wages of those occupied in that portion of the industry which is carried on for the full 24 hours daily or the extra cost would be of such a substantial amount that there is grave risk it would result in the suspension of some of these operations.

IDAHO MINING ASSOCIATION,
L. E. HANLEY, President.

HOSPITAL TRANSFERS OF VETERANS

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender a telegram from the Governor of the State of Illinois, addressed to me, and ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD, because it contains information on an important public subject.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., April 13, 1933.

Senator JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS,
Washington, D.C.:

Orders issued by Hines, Federal Veterans Administrator, directs immediate transfer compensible veterans' cases from State institutions to Hines Hospital. Representatives State Department, American Legion, and National Rehabilitation Committee desire to present facts to you as quickly as possible. Urgently request you contact President immediately, obtaining deferring of carrying out order transferring these patients pending opportunity to present facts to him. This request made for our department, public welfare, and official representatives of Legion. Representatives of State and National Legion will be in Washington any time you will see them to give you the details. Am therefore asking that you permit them to see you at once. It is felt that the proper care of many invalided veterans and the peace of mind of their families are at stake. Please answer.

HENRY HORNER, Governor.

REFINANCING OF AGRICULTURAL INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD and appropriately referred, a resolution adopted by the North Dakota Holiday Association.

There being no obection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We urge Congress to immediately pass legislation for the refinancing of the farm indebtedness under the provisions of the Frazier bill, or similar legislation. In any event the interest rate and amortized payments should not exceed 3 percent interest. The business of financing should come directly from the Government without the intervention of banking racketeers to add more to the farmers' interest rate.

We demand the immediate removal from their positions of all the present officers of the Federal Land Bank of St. Paul and a thorough checking and house-cleaning in every department of that institution, and the immediate appointment of new, fair, able, and courteous men to take charge of the Federal Land Bank of St. Paul, to the end that this bank may regain the good will and confidence of the general public and again be made to function as it should and deal with borrowers in a human, civil, and businesslike way. We urge the President and Congress to insist that all agencies hereafter organized to distribute Government finance or any other benefit to the farmers shall be placed in the hands of competent, public-spirited men, and that no banker be ever allowed to see the inside of any such agency. We declare that during our lifetime we have never known of a competent banker who was a public-spirited citizen. They should not be allowed to ever be connected with or interested in any finance plan intended to aid farmers.

We condemn the practice of appointing reactionary ex-bankers and others who have heretofore only exploited the farmers to act in set-ups to carry out laws now enacted and intended to help and benefit farmers, and point out the futility and uselessness of passing progressive and helpful laws for agriculture only to leave their execution to petty reactionaries who will not carry out such laws either in letter or spirit.

We commend Governor Langer for his debt and foreclosure moratorium proclamation of March 22, 1933, and recommend that it be continued in force at least until November 1, 1934. We call attention to the Debt Adjustment Act of the Province of Saskatchewan, Canada, providing for a debt moratorium, and which does not terminate until March 1, 1936. We submit that conditions are so bad in North Dakota that it will also take years for our people to stage a financial come-back.

We direct that copies of this resolution be furnished President Roosevelt, United States Senators Lynn J. Frazier and Gerald P. Nye, Congressmen J. H. Sinclair and William Lemke, Gov. William Langer, members of the President's Cabinet, and be given publication.

The foregoing is a true copy of a resolution passed unanimously on April 7, 1933, at a considerable gathering of members of the North Dakota Holiday Association held at the courthouse at Crosby, N.Dak.

Dated April 8, 1933.

OLAF BRAATELIEN,
Acting Secretary,
General Counsel, North Dakota Holiday Association,
Post Office, Crosby, N.Dak.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter which is self-explanatory and so apropros of the present discussion that I ask permission to have it put in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. JAMES, MINN., April 7, 1933.

Senator THOMAS SCHALL,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Due to the present conditions I feel that something should be done to refinance the agricultural indebtedness, and something more should be done to encourage agriculture. The poor farmers are having a terrible time and we can notice it more than anyone else here at the courthouse. They cannot meet their taxes nor their interest, and day by day farms are taken away from good, old, reliable farmers that have spent a lifetime on the farm. Farmers who have worked hard and faithful but have had a great deal of sickness, and what you might call real hard luck in farming due to unknown conditions, and now they are relieved of their small holdings due to interest and taxes.

I think that the Frazier bill would be a great help to the farmers, although I do think that a board could be omitted as some officer in the courthouse could act as such along with his other duties.

I know of a case that was foreclosed on last year and the time for redemption is soon up. This is one of the finest farms in Watonwan County and owned by Casper Brackelsberg, of Riverdale. This is the old homestead that his father proved up on. They had a family and some of them were not so well and Mr. Brackelsberg was forced to leave the farm after he had drained it completely and built up a fine lot of buildings for which he had to go in debt for, then the hard times came along and Mr. Brackelsberg could not make his interest payments, and just as soon as the interest date passed they started foreclosure as it was a wonderful farm to get for that amount of money. Here he is old, his earning days are over, and he is losing that which he holds so dear, the "old home farm." This is just one case, we have lots of them, and it seems to me that for the good of our country (and we will always have the farmer if the rest of the world expects to survive) some legislation should be passed to help these cases.

The farmers in this great State are looking to you men for help and we hope that you will do something soon.

Yours truly,

J. E. SETRUM, County Auditor.

AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from H. F. Betsinger, of Annandale, Minn., setting forth some thoughts I believe worthy of being given notice. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD the extract from the letter of President Roosevelt, to which reference is made by Mr. Betsinger, and that both letters may be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letters were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANNANDALE, MINN., April 8, 1933.

Hon. THOMAS SCHALL,
Senator, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SCHALL: Your stand on legislative matters has been very gratifying, and I commend your actions.

I add my protest to that voiced by Ed. O'Neal, President of the American Farm Bureau Federation, in regard to the drastic economy proposed by the Director of the Budget, cutting aid for agricultural education. Curtailment of the extension service, experiment stations, agricultural colleges, and vocational agricultural education would be out of line with the policy of President Roosevelt, as stated in a letter of his to the Progressive Farmer. Copy of said letter enclosed.

I agree with Mr. O'Neal in that deflation has gone far enough, and that it is time for work to be begun to establish a stable dollar. When college-trained teachers in our local consolidated school are hired at $60 a month, a reduction of 50 percent in the last 2 years, we have only one illustration. And this in the face of rising commodity prices.

You have the backing and best wishes of your constituency in your endeavors to help right the social and economic situation. The people are expecting much and should not be disappointed.

Respectfully yours,

"A FRIEND AT COURT

"I believe thoroughly in agricultural education. I regard it as one of the most important and essential branches of the whole educational effort that is being carried on in the United States. I am a firm believer also in the value of the cooperative research and experimental work and the extension service which State institutions in cooperation with the Federal Government are rendering.

"I think it would be nothing short of a disaster if any of this work were seriously curtailed. Particularly in these times when farmers are having such a desperate struggle to maintain themselves. I think it supremely important that they should have the benefit of the expert advice that colleges, experiment stations, and extension services are able to give them, and it is equally important that we should continue to hold out to their children opportunities for an education that will make them something more than field drudges.

"What I have said with respect to the agricultural colleges and their allied services applies with equal force to the lesser schools of agriculture and to the agricultural education now being carried on with such excellent promise in consolidated high schools in the rural communities.

"I am glad that I have the opportunity of expressing myself on this subject, on which I have very strong convictions." (President-elect Franklin D. Roosevelt in a letter to the editor of the Progressive Farmer.)

FOREIGN DOLLAR BONDS IN DEFAULT WITH INTEREST

Mr. FLETCHER presented a statement of the American Council of Foreign Bondholders, Inc., by Max Winkler, president, New York City, N.Y., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Letter No. 25]

NEW YORK CITY, April 5, 1933.

FOREIGN DOLLAR BONDS IN DEFAULT WITH INTEREST—PART II

Analysis of foreign dollar debt in default with interest payments demonstrates that about 44 percent of the total amount outstanding is contained under the head of national government issues; 18½ percent is provincial and 13½ percent municipal government debt; 8 percent are bank loans; and 16 percent are bonds sponsored by institutes and corporations, including railroads. Perhaps the most discouraging feature of the situation is that so large a proportion of the whole should be national or federal government obligations, since evidently the superior resources of supreme powers should enable them to continue payments after political subdivisions and corporations give up the struggle and confess their insolvency.

In Argentina, Colombia, Austria, and Hungary the National Governments have hitherto been able to pay interest in cash on their debts by the sacrifice of provincial, municipal, and corporation credit, using as a weapon their power to control foreign-exchange transactions. Generally speaking, this attitude has been defensible, but some injustice was inevitable. There are Provinces and cities in South America which could resume payment of bond service tomorrow if permitted to do so, and bondholders who carefully and skillfully selected the obligations of those political subdivisions for investment have good reason to feel aggrieved.

Such exercise of arbitrary power on the part of executives may have the effect to curtail or put a stop to the offerings of provincial and municipal loans in this market when foreign government financing recommences, as it certainly will, at least for South and Central America. This change will be welcome to national executives, who have always deplored the constant drain on trade balances caused by remittances of provincial foreign bond service and the loss of prestige when a city or a Province has defaulted in the past.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENTS

If certain contingent liabilities of the 10 national governments in default were to be added to the sum of $658,881,500 shown in the table as outstanding, the aggregate of Federal debt in default would be considerably greater, but although some of these items could more properly be classed under this heading in the case of bonds specifically guaranteed, confusion might be created thereby, since the market knows most of these securities as bank and railroad obligations.

On the other hand, there are redeeming features regarding each of the nationalities here listed, except with respect to Chile, Peru, Russia, and Bolivia, seeing that all of the others are paying either in interest-bearing scrip, in currency, or by partial cash remittances.

The liabilities of national governments were discussed at more length in a previous bulletin, but the relative volume of each direct federal debt in default is here more clearly indicated, and is noteworthy.

Peru owes and defaults on just double the amount ascribed to Yugoslavia. Bolivia defaults on considerably more than Greece and Bulgaria combined. Russia and Brazil are in classes by themselves, since nobody knows what amount of debt could be usefully and comfortably carried by them if good government were assured for a decade. The Chilean National Government is in default on a total principal amount of $260,724,000 if the guaranteed State Mortgage Bank loans are included. Compare with the other defaulting governments, most of whom have done something for the protection of bondholders.

PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Not every sovereign power permits its political subdivisions to contract foreign obligations. It is, therefore, not surprising that the provincial securities of only four nations are in default on their dollar loans.

In both Brazil and Colombia the respective States and Departments have always enjoyed extensive autonomy, which will probably be restricted in the future. Several of them are in serious difficulties, a condition which reflects adversely on national credit, and the federal governments are now in a position to exact a price for their assistance.

However, plans for a new foreign debt regime are complicated by the incidence that in each of those countries there is one political subdivision, more powerful, wealthy, and advanced than the others, which has plunged deeply into debt and, while demanding every particle of support that the federal government and legislature can bestow, defies interference with its domestic affairs.

San Paulo State in Brazil and Antioquia Department in Colombia merit the confidence of investors for their excellent past record and praiseworthy industrial progress. It may be taken for granted that they will eventually regain a measure of their past prestige, but it is devoutly to be hoped that resumption of payments by other provincial governments in Brazil and Colombia will not be retarded during the process of rehabilitation by these two politically predominant States.

A Government commission in Brazil is endeavoring to elaborate a scheme for nationalization of the State foreign debts, but nothing practical has resulted, although the commission has been in existence for a year. At least two of the States are evidently buying their own bonds in this market, and San Paulo proposes to use all available funds for this purpose, giving promissory notes for current service requirements.

Action by the Government of Antioquia may be delayed until settlement of the conflict with Peru.

Argentine provincial government debt has never been rated by competent observers at anything approaching the level of national Argentine credit. It was obvious 2 years ago that the brunt of financial strait would have to be borne by the Provinces in case full payment of bond service on all Argentine foreign obligations, funded and floating, should be found impossible to maintain.

The provincial debt of Austria is the least of that small republic's worries.

MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENTS

The aggregate of municipal foreign-dollar debt in default is large, owing to the relatively heavy indebtedness of four cities, namely, Rio de Janeiro, Vienna, Budapest, and San Paulo, on which nearly $100,000,000 is outstanding.

It is a moot question whether the loans of capital cities in some countries should be considered national government debt. Argentina does so consider the obligations of Buenos Aires City, which is, of course, not in the Province of Buenos Aires. Rio de Janeiro, Santiago, and Lima are purely national strongholds. Bogota is technically in the Department of Cundinamarca, but manages its own affairs as the seat of the federal government. Vienna and Budapest are the essence of Austrian and Hungarian sovereignty.

There are four consolidated municipal loans in default. One of these, a Chilean obligation, is sponsored by 65 towns, and the number of cities and towns embellished at the cost of American bondholders runs well over 100, financed by 31 bond issues of 9 nationalities.

As a general rule the outlook for resumption of payments and permanence thereof is at least as good as, if not better than, by the provincial governments. There have been several instances of city councils protesting against a national embargo on remittances.

BANKS

Bank loans in default on dollar-interest payments number 18, but the enormous total outstanding debt of the Chilean Mortgage Bank, $83,319,000, overshadows the rest, and is one of the most regrettable features of New York foreign financing.

These are direct Government loans, and could quite well be included under national government debts, but they were accepted by this market as bank loans and must be discriminated as such in order to avoid misunderstanding.

When Chilean credit began to wane under the weight of the dollar-debt pyramid, bankers asked for specific guaranties which

Chile, in its arrogance, refused to grant; but the Government was willing to guarantee the obligations of its own mortgage bank, and since a bank loan secured by the Government is practically the same thing as a Government loan secured by the State Mortgage Bank, the guaranty, although worthless, was accepted and proved more effective as a lure than as a safeguard.

Three Colombian banks which obtained loans in this market, and which are now in default, may resume payments on a reduced schedule earlier than the provincial governments. Bank of Colombia, Mortgage Bank of Colombia, and Mortgage Bank of Bogota are highly respected institutions in Colombia, and the first named has good foreign connections.

Principal and interest of State Mortgage Bank of Yugoslavia is guaranteed by the Government under the laws of its organization.

All Hungarian banks which have been financed in this market are old-established concerns, which may be trusted to honor their obligations, at least in part, as soon as economic conditions of the country permit them to remit bond service.

INSTITUTES AND CORPORATIONS

If from the total of $238,321,400, principal amount of 16 loans, are deducted the Swedish Kreuger defaults and the debts of two Chilean nitrate plants, only $49,615,000 would remain under this heading.

Creditors of the match concerns may at least feel assured that the Swedish Government and the receivers will do their utmost to secure for them the available assets.

The Anglo-Chilean and Lautaro Nitrate Corporations are respectable business entities, which have been well managed in the past. Unfortunately, the whole nitrate situation is inextricably mixed up with the Chilean Government insolvency and fiscal disorder, or these immense organizations, which have been thoroughly modernized, would be able to pay some bond interest even now.

Hungary is the only other debtor of over $10,000,000 in this category. The item is composed exclusively of institutions which bear a strong resemblance to mortgage banks under another name.

Brazil and Costa Rica are represented by two railroads. The Paulista Railway, of San Paulo, Brazil, is a splendid property, efficiently managed, about which bondholders need have no anxiety beyond their participation in the general disability arising out of temporary foreign-exchange restrictions. The Pacific Railway of Costa Rica 7½-percent bonds are a straight Government obligation, and are so treated in the funding plan of that Government.

GERMANY

It is needless to underestimate the consequences to the entire German economic structure, as well as to the country's relations with the rest of the world, of the policy pursued, or reported to be pursued, by the present German administration. While fundamental conditions in the Reich have improved to an appreciable extent, as evidenced by a number of barometric indices, the attitude maintained by the Nazi government may, unless arrested in time, have a profound effect upon German industry, commerce, finance, and politics. On the other hand, if the more rational element in Germany will analyze the existing conditions, and the results which Hitler's suicidal policy may have, a prompt change may be decided upon by the President of the Republic, who still has the power to dismiss the chancellor if he so chooses. Whether it is possible for Hindenburg to resort to such a step under the present conditions in Germany, with the Reichswehr apparently on the side of the Nazi chief, is something that cannot be answered at the moment with any degree of definiteness.

At any rate, the evaluation of German bonds today is rendered very difficult, because whatever judgment is handed down will have to be based upon sentiment and psychology rather than fundamentals. While the National-Socialist group has been, to a large extent, responsible for the success at Lausanne last summer, in connection with the virtual elimination of all reparations payments, it is to be regretted that Germany did not take advantage of the friendly feeling which seems to have been built up abroad, particularly in the United States. Public opinion might have aided Germany in achieving, in the realm of politics, what she has managed to accomplish in the field of finance. Reference is made to certain territorial adjustments in the East, which Germany is particularly anxious to achieve, and also to radical modifications of the Versailles Treaty. The Hitler policy is bound to render all this very difficult, if not altogether impossible.

The present activities of the Nazi regime are apparently designed to carry out some of the campaign promises which are scheduled to lead the nation to recovery, to prosperity, honor, and glory. Before very long, it should become clear whether these promises will materialize. Nobody knows. One thing, however, is certain. In the long run, logic and reason must gain the upper hand. What sacrifices Germany and the world may have to make before they will return is something that no one can state today with certainty.

So long as the situation will continue in its present state, German bonds, including those of the better class, are likely to display a downward tendency.

URUGUAY

The latest news from South America confirms our previously expressed fears. Whether developments in Uruguay will be followed by a complete suspension of payments by the Government is still too early to state. At any rate, quotations of obligations may be assumed to have discounted to an appreciable extent complete default. It is for this reason that we would advise retention of the Uruguay 6-percent bonds, but would recommend disposing of the 8's of 1946, largely because of the unwarranted discrepancy in quotations compared with other Uruguayan issues.

It may perhaps be of interest to learn that Uruguay's first loan in the American market synchronized with her default in regard to sinking-fund payments; this apparently did not deter us from calling upon the American public to take up Uruguayan issues. The liberality which characterized our lending to Uruguay may to some extent account for the indifference on the part of the Republic toward her foreign, including American, creditors. Uruguayan loans outstanding in the American market aggregated, as of January 1, 1933, almost $65,000,000, which, if added to our so-called "direct investments" in the Republic, brings America's total stake up to well over $90,000,000.

Another interesting point to which attention may be directed is the fact that while American investments in Uruguay increased most pronouncedly since the war, resulting in a marked advance in our trade with the Republic, the commercial development of the country has not been in proportion to the amount of American capital which had flowed into it. Furthermore, the existence of a trade balance favorable to the United States may well give rise to the question whether the sharp increase in the amount of American capital going into Uruguay was entirely warranted and whether Great Britain may not have proved a more logical place for our southern neighbor to seek financial accommodations. However, the British knew better.

COLOMBIA DECREES A MORATORIUM

Announcement on March 29 of a Colombian Government decree establishing a moratorium for interest payments on the national funded foreign debt caused a sharp break in Colombian 6's and Agricultural Mortgage Bank issues and softened the whole South American list.

April 15, when a coupon is payable on the Agricultural Mortgage Bank 6's of 1948, is the first date when this suspension can become effective, and if funds for this payment have already been remitted, there will be no actual default until July 1, when Government 6's of 1927–28 should yield the usual half-yearly interest quota.

While the text of the decree has not yet been promulgated here, a United Press dispatch quotes the Finance Minister as having stated that the Government is conducting conversations with foreign bankers seeking to arrive at an accord regarding the moratorium, which indicates that some satisfaction will be given to bondholders—possibly scrip payments of interest.

Another report claims that the decree also authorizes negotiation with the Government's creditors for modification of the terms as to interest, amortization, and the money in which debt service is to be payable.

In previous bulletins the Council warned bondholders of the dangerous situation created by the war with Peru, and also intimated that a scaling down of interest rates might be needful and would be advantageous to the creditors of Colombia, especially to holders of departmental and municipal bonds.

It is much to be regretted that the press of this country did not make vigorous protest against Peru's high-handed procedure in occupying Leticia in September of last year. Action by the League of Nations may still be effective to prevent a spread of hostilities to the coast, if the other Pacific powers of America will veto naval operations and support the League's dictum that Peru must withdraw from Leticia.

However, this intervention by the League came too late to save American investors from the obligation to finance a senseless and futile war. President Olaya has done his utmost to maintain interest payments on the national debt, but the Colombian people are now thoroughly roused and will insist on devoting all Government resources to defend the national territory.

Yearly interest on the outstanding principal amount of the six bond issues hitherto preserved intact by the Colombian Government, in regard to interest payments, totals $4,106,355; and the sum of default will apparently be increased by $67,716,500 later this year on account of this development alone.

AFFILIATION OF MUTUAL SAVINGS BANKS WITH FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency a statement of the Mutual Savings Banks Association as to the affiliation of that class of banks with the Federal Reserve System as associate members.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

METHOD OF ACCOMPLISHMENT

It is suggested that mutual savings banks be permitted to enter the system on a limited basis, as follows:

1. (a) Purchase stock in Federal Reserve System where permitted under existing State laws; where State laws do not permit stock investments, provide that mutual savings banks may make deposit with Federal Reserve bank equal to proper allotment of stock until permissive State legislation is enacted.

(b) Basis of stock allocation to be determined by obtaining average ratio of deposits to capital stock of member banks, and from this ratio, applied to deposits of mutual savings banks, develop a computed base.

2. Maintain a cash deposit with the Federal Reserve System equal to 2 percent of their total deposits as a maximum. Justification for the lower percentage than required of member banks is that the participation of benefits by mutual savings banks will be more limited and will not be constant, but merely utilized during emergency.

3. Maintain securities eligible for discount, such as governments, short term municipals, etc., equal to 8 percent of their deposits, to be utilized for advances from the Federal Reserve System in case of need.

4. During an emergency, permit additional advances up to six times the cash deposit by the use of 90-day notes secured to the satisfaction of the Federal Reserve bank by other high-grade bonds as collateral.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS OF BANKING LAWS WITH REFERENCE TO MUTUAL SAVINGS BANKS

The primary purpose of this memorandum is to present the facts which justify the affiliation of mutual savings banks with the Federal Reserve System as associate members, the method by which it could be accomplished, and the necessity for the extension of any Federal deposit insurance plan to include mutual savings banks in the event such plan applies to savings accounts of commercial banks.

Mutual savings banks, since they do not have capital stock, are not at present eligible for membership in the Federal Reserve System. These banks number 574, located in 18 States, with assets of $11,180,208,996 and with 13,268,466 depositors, as of January 1, 1933. Most of them are in densely populated areas in the financial and industrial centers. Although of outstanding importance, in view of their volume of deposits and the number of depositors, they are entirely outside of the central banking system of the country, and have access to the Federal Reserve System only through correspondent banks which are members of the System. Their deposits are equal in volume to two thirds of the commercial deposits in all the banks of the United States.

As a rule mutual savings banks are not liquid to any considerable degree, since in their very nature they are community institutions and as a group have 54.6 percent of their deposits invested in mortgages on homes. The rest of the deposits are invested for the most part in Government and municipal and long-term bonds of the highest type. They have not sought high or speculative returns, but only stability and safety. These latter investments are sometimes termed "legals" because they are usually prescribed by State law.

Mutual savings banks are of a quasi-public character; they have no stockholders, but all their assets are held for the benefit of their depositors. Their object, as stated in some of the early charters, is to receive and safely invest the savings of mechanics, laborers, and others, thus affording to such persons the advantages of security and interest for their money, and in this way ameliorating the condition of the poor and laboring classes by engendering habits of industry and frugality. Its only object is the safekeeping and provident investment of the funds of the depositors.

Depositors in mutual savings banks are generally the small savers of the country, who are accumulating funds for old age or special purposes. These total savings represent an average deposit of $751.48 for approximately 1 out of every 9 people in the country. The very fact that they have deposits in such banks indicates their belief in the stability of the United States and in its ability to protect their savings.

In addition to advantages to small savers, mutual savings banks are an indispensable part of the country's economic structure. They provide funds for home owners at small or no expense, with the added benefit that ordinarily these mortgage loans can be continued or extended at no cost.

A splendid testimonial of the care exercised in making investments is to be found in the fact that, by and large, the mutual savings banks, as a group, have a long and noteworthy record for safety, with but comparatively few failures. In New York, for instance, with a total of 140 savings banks, there have been since 1844 only 3 of such banks closed with any losses to depositors and no closings since 1911, other than through mergers which produced no losses to depositors. In Connecticut, with its 75 mutual savings banks, 1 bank was closed in 1911, which paid 86 cents per dollar of deposit.

It is realized that perhaps the corporate powers exercised by the mutual savings banks are not entirely consistent with the original purposes of the Federal Reserve Act which was broadly designed to serve commercial banking and to remedy defects in our national banking system. The Federal Reserve System, however, has outgrown its original functions. The events of the past 2 years have shown the necessity for a strong, liquid, and efficient central banking system. It must formulate and guide the policies of the entire banking field. In order to function most efficiently in this respect, the Federal Reserve System should direct the policies of all banks in a general way, and, consequently, the law must be so framed as to permit banks to become members without undue hardships.

Recently much emphasis has been made to depositors generally of the desirability of membership in the Federal Reserve System and that members of the System have special advantages over banks which are not members. During the present period of extraordinary business depression and low level of public confidence, the nervousness has at times caused very great pressure, and indeed runs, on mutual savings banks. To supply the currency necessary to meet the demands of the depositors, mutual savings banks have in some cases been compelled to sell prime securities on a demoralized market, thus sustaining considerable loss. Likewise, their demands on their correspondent commercial banks have imposed a very great strain on the commercial banks, which in some cases were under severe pressure for cash from other customers.

A most important justification of this proposal, in addition to stabilizing the banking situation, is one resting on the need for currency control. Due to the large volume of deposits and the great number of depositors whose tendency to hoard may be the greatest, the failure to affiliate the mutual savings banks with the central banking system presents a constant and recurring menace to the stability of the entire banking system and currency control. Bank runs are contagious; they lead to hoarding. Hoarding disturbs the whole currency balance. Savings-banks depositors are so numerous that it is important from the standpoint of preventing hoarding that the banks be put in a position to pay hysterical depositors. There is no way to check hoarding except by gaining confidence in banks. As a matter of psychology only those banks that can and do pay their depositors when they want to be paid gain and hold confidence.

It is suggested that the failure to adopt reasonable means to protect, in times of an extraordinary depression, the 13,000,000 depositors in mutual savings banks, may result in wrecking the remainder of our banking structure. These depositors must be protected, otherwise the deflation already being brought about by liquidation of commercial banks will be increased. These institutions perform a useful public service in that they absorb a substantial proportion of Government and municipal securities.

The inclusion of the mutual banks will not encumber the Federal Reserve System. As compared with other banking institutions the stability of the mutual savings banks is relatively high; consequently, no drastic expense would be required or undue burden imposed.

The fact that mutual savings banks are entirely outside the central banking system of the country is due to restrictions of law and not through choice. The laws of some States require savings banks to be mutual institutions, the primary idea being that an institution of this character should be in the hands of disinterested persons, the profits, after deducting necessary expenses, to inure wholly to the benefit of depositors. Obviously, this legal restriction should not be permitted to operate to the disadvantage of such banks.

Soon after its creation the Federal Reserve Board recognized the desirability of including mutual savings banks in the Federal Reserve System. In 1917 the Board recommended that the act be amended to authorize mutual savings banks to become associate members of the Federal Reserve System under prescribed conditions. In a press release the Board states further that if such an amendment is adopted, such banks should "be required to carry a reserve balance with the Federal Reserve bank against their time deposits in the same proportion as member banks and that accommodations proposed for mutual savings banks be limited strictly to the discount of their 30-day obligations." Subsequently the mutual savings banks themselves approved an amendment along these general lines. Apparently the recommendation was never pressed to a conclusion.

It is true that savings banks are theoretically protected to a certain degree by a notice clause. But during the past banking strain the savings banks generally did not require the observance of this clause, as such action would have added greatly to the general uneasiness and would have increased hoarding. It would also have tended to increase the strain brought upon member banks of the Federal Reserve System.

The statement is sometimes made by those not well informed that the mutual savings banks should not be treated as demand institutions. Whether or not from a theoretical standpoint they should operate more in the nature of an investment institution rather than as a demand bank is not important. The fact is that they have and do operate in that manner and a change cannot be made without serious disarrangement of our financial structure. A long period of transitory readjustment would be required.

METHOD OF ACCOMPLISHING AFFILIATION

An affiliation on a limited basis in the Federal Reserve System seems feasible. The following principles should be observed: Savings banks do not expect to obtain the benefits of the Federal Reserve System without accepting their proper share of responsibilities, depending upon extent of their participation. The Government is not expected to make special concessions to the mutual savings banks over other banks, but merely to provide for savings banks the same character of participation as is afforded other types of banking institutions.

As a suggested basis for the proposed affiliation each mutual savings bank might in addition to its till money maintain a cash deposit at the Federal Reserve bank in an amount of 2 percent of its deposits. The interest on this cash-reserve deposit would pay for the cost of the service rendered by the Federal Reserve bank. Justification for a smaller percentage cash deposit than for member banks is that the mutual savings banks would not participate in the benefits of the Federal Reserve System to the same extent as member banks. Stock subscription in Federal Reserve System is not possible under present restrictive law governing savings-bank investments.

Each bank might also be required to maintain on hand paper eligible for discount, largely securities of the Federal Government and short-term municipals, in an amount of 8 percent of its deposits. As occasion might require, a mutual savings bank might deposit its eligible paper with the Federal Reserve bank for discount or for advances of currency. The provision for the use of eligible paper is precisely the same as for member banks.

In case the sum obtained by this method should not be sufficient to meet the continued demand for currency on the part of the bank's customers, the bank could present "legals" to the Federal Reserve bank as collateral in sufficient volume to secure from the total cash reserve with the Federal Reserve bank five times the volume of that bank's deposit with the Federal Reserve bank. This additional provision for the use of high-grade bonds as collateral is suggested only for emergency use, similar to that provided in the recent emergency banking legislation.

The necessity of maintaining the Federal Reserve banks in liquid condition is realized. The mutual banks do not advocate membership as a means of converting into currency long-term obligations, neither do they advocate the use of mortgages ordinarily as a basis for loans. Both types of security should be used only as collateral to 90-day notes during an emergency.

On a basis of demonstrated experience, the method outlined would produce an adequate amount to cover the demands brought about by any run on a bank. Most runs have been stopped before 15 percent of the deposits have been withdrawn. So far as is known, in only one case have the withdrawals exceeded that percentage.

Thus, under the proposed plan, a mutual savings bank would have available in cash or eligible paper 11 percent or 12 percent of its deposit liability. An advance of 10 percent by the Federal Reserve bank from the cash reserve against collateral of "legals" would make 21 percent or 22 percent of the bank's deposit liability available to the bank in cash. The cash reserve would be composed of 2 percent of the deposit liability if each mutual savings bank deposited in the Federal Reserve bank.

The value to the 13,000,000 depositors of mutual savings banks, in relieving them from apprehension, would be incalculable. It would further make the Federal Reserve System in fact the central banking system in the United States.

An additional benefit would result from membership on the above basis, because mutual savings banks would necessarily maintain a larger section of their portfolios in eligible securities. Funds would be used in greater degree toward absorbing Government obligations.

EXTENSION OF ANY PROPOSED DEPOSIT-INSURANCE PLAN TO MUTUAL SAVINGS BANKS

The savings banks as a whole have not considered whether or not any proposed deposit-insurance plan is essential as applied generally and take no position here with reference to that feature. But if the proposed deposit-insurance feature is to be applied to savings deposits in member banks, it should likewise be available to mutual savings banks. Equality of opportunity is required.

The country's total bank deposits are approximately $40,000,000,000, and about $10,000,000,000 of this amount is with the mutual savings banks. The remainder is about equally divided between commercial deposits and savings deposits in commercial banks. Many States require a segregation of savings deposits and restrict investments, and in such instances savings funds are invested, generally speaking, in precisely the same way as deposits of mutual savings banks.

The 13,000,000 depositors of mutual savings banks are entitled to the same protection that may be eventually accorded savings-account depositors in other banks. The very nature of the mutual savings bank business, its peculiar function of dealing with vast numbers of people of relatively little financial knowledge or experience, as well as limited means, its general standing in the minds of savings depositors as a safe place for their funds, seem to be basic reasons why the mutual savings banks should be accorded the same opportunity to participate in any deposit-insurance plan as other banks.

If a deposit-insurance plan were applied to the savings accounts in commercial banks and not extended to include mutual savings banks, the result would be disastrous to the latter. Some of the mutual savings banks are among the oldest institutions of the country. The Government should not by a deliberate act destroy an established banking business enjoying the confidence of a great proportion of the people, especially when such institutions were established wholly for public purposes.

It is understood that the deposit-insurance plan contemplates the use of Government funds and Government machinery. Government assistance of either character should not be used for the benefit of a particular class of institutions or people, particularly when mutual banks are trustees of a public franchise exercised by them for the benefit of the public at large, and especially that part of the public in the location of the particular institutions, as well as for the depositors in their institutions.

"SAVE AMERICAN INDUSTRY"

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On yesterday the Washington News printed a very significant editorial entitled "Save American Industry." It begins with the words:

One issue is bigger than all others now.

I ask that the remainder of the editorial may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the remainder of the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Save American industry. Safe banks, higher farm prices, and all the other necessary moves of the administration against the depression will not pull us out of the ditch until the great American mass market is restored. That means putting wages, decent wages, regular wages into the pockets of labor, so labor can buy goods.

Here is the tremendous opportunity of President Roosevelt. He, and he alone, has the power and the prestige to move into this crisis of closing factories, idle merchants, and jobless workers, and stop the deflation of the mass market.

Intelligent employers are powerless. They are in competition with sweatshops—sweatshops not merely in the garment trades but in every line of industry, big and little. They cannot keep up wages and mass buying power unless they are protected from sweatshop competition, unless the Government throws its protection around American standards for industry.

President Roosevelt knows this. His remarkable telegram yesterday to governors of industrial States pointed the necessity of minimum wage laws as follows:

"May I call your attention to minimum wage law just passed by Legislature of New York and approved by Governor Lehman, which declared it against public policy for any employer to pay women or minors a wage which is 'less than the fair and reasonable value for services rendered and less than sufficient to meet the ultimate cost of living necessary for health.'

"This represents great forward step against lowering of wages which constitutes a serious form of unfair competition against other employers, reduces the purchasing power of the workers, and threatens the stability of industry. I hope that similar action can be taken by the other States for protection of the public interest."

Splendid. We must stop the wage reduction which "threatens the stability of industry." But that cannot be done by a minimum wage only for women and minors, a minority of wage earners. It cannot be done by State action alone. Federal action is required to strike at the evil which is national.

The President knows that also. Yesterday his Secretary of Labor told a House committee that he favors the purpose and principles of the 30-hour week bill, which has passed the Senate. But Secretary Perkins added, significantly, that amendments were needed to that bill to give greater elasticity and powers of enforcement. The administration is now preparing such amendments.

A 30-hour week law for industry in interstate commerce would merely be another share-the-misery move unless it provided minimum wages. It would drive pauper wages still lower. It would make of American industry one vast sweatshop and drive decent companies to the wall. It would reduce the mass market to the demand of coolies and the purse of slaves. This is no jittery fear. It is the hard reality to which we are now headed unless wages and purchasing power can be stabilized at an American level—quickly.

There is only one way to stop that plunge. Talk, even from the President, won't do it—all of President Hoover's appeals against wages cuts proved futile. Courageous but isolated employers cannot do it—many who tried to maintain wages against sweatshop competitors have gone bankrupt. Organized labor cannot do it—labor has no bargaining power, with millions of hungry jobless willing if necessary to work for starvation wages.

Only governmental action can do it. Only a Federal law fixing a range of maximum hours and minimum wages, flexible enough to be enforced justly by joint capital-labor-Government boards for industries as a whole, and for the protection of the Nation as a whole, can do it.

This can be achieved legally. The wide constitutional emergency powers, under which the President has acted up to now in other matters can cover this general welfare legislation. Its legality can be buttressed by the Government's interstate-commerce authority, and by the power of taxation over sweatshops which—to use the President's phrase—"threaten the stability of industry."

But this is no time for legal quibbles. When the President took office he found the banks crashing. He cut through red tape, asked and received from Congress emergency power to meet an emergency. He has done well, miraculously well. But, despite all he has done, there is more deflation, more unemployment, more business failures than a month ago.

Today American industry is crashing.

President Roosevelt can save American industry. We believe he will try. If we read the statement of Secretary Perkins aright, if we understand the purpose of the President in his minimum-wage appeal, he is preparing to lead Congress in rewriting the 30-hour week bill so as to protect wages, to create buying power, to control production, and to start business forward again.

In this heroic effort, President Roosevelt will have the support of the people. The people yet look to the President to restore their right to work and to enjoy the fruit of their labor.

REHABILITATION OF LABOR AND INDUSTRY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, yesterday the Governor of Massachusetts, Governor Ely, and a group of citizens representing the industries and the employees in the State of Massachusetts visited the President and submitted to him a rehabilitation program which they described as the "Massachusetts plan for the rehabilitation of labor and industry."

This program seems to meet with the approval of most of the industrial leaders and labor leaders of that Commonwealth. It seems to me to be both timely and comprehensive. If time permitted, I should like to have the 11 items in the program read, but I shall not take the time of the Senate to do that. I will content myself by stating that in general the program commends itself to me, and by asking that it be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate. I have reason to believe it will receive most sympathetic consideration from President Roosevelt.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MASSACHUSETTS PLAN FOR THE REHABILITATION OF LABOR AND INDUSTRY

1. The number of unemployed in this country, estimated generally from 12 to 15 millions, is a grave menace to the economic, political, and moral health of the United States.

2. The importance of getting at least 9,000,000 unemployed to work as quickly as possible is comparable to the need recognized in the measures enacted for aiding the banking structure, reducing Government expenditures, and to those contemplated for aiding the farmers, railroads, and other interests.

3. Public works and other measures being considered will be helpful, but at best will give work to a small percentage of the unemployed.

4. The only way to absorb unemployed is to place them where work is available in industry and business now.

5. It is necessary that this be done on a national scale, as it is impossible of accomplishment except on a basis that does not discriminate between geographical sections and industries.

6. We believe the President should therefore seek immediate legislation to regulate hours of work for men and women on the principle of the 5-day week and the shorter working day. We also believe that authority should be given to the President or his administrative representative to modify the basic provisions regarding hours of labor in accordance with the demonstrated needs of individual industries, provided that such changes are not in violation of the object of furthering the utmost practical reabsorption of the unemployed.

7. Measures, proposed by the President for regulating hours of work should provide for some degree of control in each industry of hours of operation of individual member plants.

8. Also, to protect workers from exploitation and to preserve price stability, there should be coupled with such measures minimum wage schedules suited to each industry and based somewhat on the cost and standard of living in the various sections of the country.

9. The United States is the only civilized country that permits the working of women and minors on all-night shifts. This practice seems both economically and socially unsound. A large proportion of such women and minors employed on all-night shifts are found in certain industries. This practice can be discontinued without adding to the cost of operations, as has been demonstrated by a number of concerns who employ only men on night runs. This employment of women and minors at night in the industrial plants, certainly between the hours of 10 and 6, should be permanently abolished in the United States.

10. To eliminate ruthless competition, which is constantly reducing wages, lowering prices, lessening earnings, and thereby adding to unemployment, we favor reasonable modification of the provisions of the antitrust laws to permit agreements among the members of individual industries, subject to Federal approval in order to promote the stabilization of wages and prices for the benefit of both the employer and employee.

11. It is essential that the authority given to regulate hours of work and to establish minimum wages also provide for their readjustment as and when changes in demand and in cost of living may require.

PETITION FROM LOUISIANA—QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I hope no Senator will ask me to yield for a few moments. I intend to occupy the floor for only 4 or 5 minutes.

Mr. President, I have risen this morning to a question of personal privilege and to propound an inquiry to the Chair and to the Senate. I hope that I may have the attention of Senators while I propound a parliamentary inquiry.

We have a rule of the Senate, Mr. President, found in the Senate Manual, reading as follows:

No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

That rule, as I understand, applies to Senators, so that no Senator shall impute to another Senator any conduct or motive unworthy of a Senator.

There is another rule, Mr. President, under which petitions and memorials are filed in the Senate. That rule provides in part:

Every petition or memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have endorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate. But no petition or memorial or other paper signed by citizens or subjects of a foreign power shall be received, unless the same be transmitted to the Senate by the President.

As I understand the clause to which I have just referred, it seems that only such petitions as the President sees fit are to be transmitted to the Senate, but there is otherwise no limit, and I would naturally understand that there is practically no restriction as to what is to be done in the absence of any rule or interpretation.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to one of the morning newspapers that I picked up this morning, as I was arranging to leave the hotel. I am reading from the Washington Herald of this morning. As a matter of fact, I understand this was published in the papers of the country yesterday afternoon, but it was of such significance that it was republished on the same front pages of this morning's news notes:

LOUISIANANS URGE OUSTING OF HUEY LONG—PETITION SENATE FOR INQUIRY—"KINGFISH" CALLED "GRAFTER" AND "DANGEROUS PARANOIAC"

By Universal Service

An extraordinary petition bristling with charges of graft and corruption against Senator HUEY P. LONG (Democrat), of Louisiana, and demanding the unseating of the self-styled "Kingfish", was received yesterday by Vice President Garner from citizens of Louisiana.

The Vice President, without comment, referred the petition, signed by former Gov. John M. Parker and 23 other Louisianans, to the Senate Elections Committee. This action made the document, embodying several grave charges against LONG, a privileged matter.

Mr. President, upon looking up the law and calling upon such knowledge as I have of the law, this document has become, as this newspaper says, a privileged matter. No one publishing or distributing the same is in any manner accountable for the circulation of its contents. It is a privileged document, as is said by this newspaper here this morning.

This document that has been sent here is signed by a former Governor of the State of Louisiana with whom I have been involved in countless court proceedings varying over a period of 15 years. Also, I have been involved with him in political contests varying over a period of nearly the same length of time. This gentleman has been quite unsuccessful before the courts of the State and the courts of the United States. He has been just as unsuccessful before the people in elections. He has been the chairman or the president of maybe 25 different societies and associations that have been set up in the last 10 or 15 years for the purpose of destroying me politically and personally or disbarring me as a member of the bar of any court.

Mr. President, this is the same party who only a few years ago, while he was Governor of the State, about 10 or 12 years ago, came here to Washington and said that his own State of Louisiana was in command of outlaws and he would have to have the United States Army to rescue it—and this, too, at a time when he was Governor of the State himself. He has come here now in a document to the Senate, in the guise and under the pretense of being a memorial for a public inquiry, in which he has placed before the Senate and made privileged for every blackmailing institution of the country the same old claptrap and rottenness that he has undertaken to parade over the State of Louisiana and this country for a period of at least 12 or 15 years. Without any specification of anything he has presented to the Senate and the Senate has received—and this forum of the Senate is the means of its publicity under privilege of such statements as this:

Tenth—

This is one of the main statements—

During the administration of said HUEY P. LONG as Governor of Louisiana more than $150,000,000 of bonds issued and of funds derived from taxation have been spent by the Louisiana Highway Commission and other State agencies controlled and dominated by said LONG. Of this sum a conservative estimate is that at least $10,000,000 has been used for what is commonly known as graft and for corrupt purposes. The said LONG is personally responsible for this condition.

The gentleman, among other things of this kind, has been allowed and is given the privilege and absolute immunity to place such statements before the Senate; and others of his kind in other States are free, if this thing is legitimate, to do the same thing with regard to every man in the Senate, if they write some of the things to the President that they have written to me about some of my colleagues. They can write just as much about others as they have written about me. I have received some letters that did credit even to me compared to some of the letters I have received about some of my colleagues—letters from some of the gentlemen who have been defeated in political campaigns.

If this thing is legitimate, there is nothing on the living earth to except a Member of the United States Senate from any kind of calumny and giving it any kind of privilege and any kind of immunity with which it is possible to clothe it under the law. If this is to be tolerated by the Senate, if this is within the rules of the Senate, then there is no reason on earth why we cannot say that Senator Jones, from the State of X, is the father of 17 illegitimate children, and therefore ask that he be excluded from the Senate; or that Senator Smith, from the State of Y, burned down a Catholic church and killed four nus, and therefore ask that he be barred from serving in the United States Senate. The same rule would apply, the same document would be filed, the same immunity and the same privilege would attach, if that is the kind of course petitions can take and if that is the kind of calumny permitted to be presented in this way.

Mr. President, I do not say this in defense of myself, but to show how ridiculous and how helpless persons are from such calumny if they happen to be so unfortunate as to sit here in the United States Senate. Here is a board that this man is talking about that had 19 men supervising every dime that was spent before they spend it and after they spend it, a board comprising some of the leading bankers of the State, at least two thirds of whom are members of clubs and organizations with which this ex-Governor had been affiliated. There had never been a complaint filed before that board, there had never been a nickel spent that they did not allow to be spent, there had never been a dime spent that they did not see someone spend, and on that board sat the members of his own constitutional league that he was then running in his effort to unseat the Governor of the State at that time. Yet he comes in here today and simply says that he conservatively estimates that since $150,000,000 was spent by the State highway commission, at least $10,000,000 of it is graft, and that he estimates that HUEY P. LONG might have received about $10,000,000 out of the $150,00,000 spent.

Mr. President, I am submitting the matter to the Senate without having had the time to prepare anything. I am submitting the subject matter to the Senate in order that the Senate may consider it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am not without sympathy with the situation of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. He has raised an important question, and I wish to speak for a moment to the subject. My remarks are in no sense presented as a lecture, because censoriousness of attitude would be the last thing permitted here.

First, however, let us remember that he who lives by the sword shall die by the sword.

Secondly, there is in this world a law of compensation, which sooner or later does its perfect work. No one escapes that law. If we in the Senate—and I apply this admonition to myself—were more careful respecting the tender subject of human character and respecting the reputation of other persons who cannot answer here, we would have more sympathy extended to us when we find ourselves the objects of calumny, as we all do now and then. It is an inescapable part of public life.

But the Senator from Louisiana, who is himself an able lawyer, has raised a legal point respecting censorship or "privilege" that I think should have some attention. I beg the pardon of the Senate for that which seems ungracious—that is to say, quoting from one of my own speeches—but the speech from which I quote was delivered in May 1917, when we were about to engage in war or indeed had already entered the World War. I was then, and all during the war, much opposed to censorship. I am still opposed to so-called "censorship of the press." But to say merely that we are "opposed to censorship of the press" does not enlighten anybody unless he be a student of the law with particular reference to censorship. So again, proceeding to do that which apparently would be immodest, I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read from what was in May 1917 my matured conclusion respecting "censorship of the press."

Speaking in the Senate on May 9, 1917, in opposing a so-called "censorship of the press", I said, in part, as follows:

Mr. President, I am opposed to a censorship of the press as we have come to know that expression, and I oppose it upon the ground of public policy and upon the ground of constitutionality. I shall discuss the subject, reviewing both aspects of the same as they present themselves to me; that is, from the standpoint of public policy and from the standpoint of its constitutionality.

Press censorships have invariably brought unhappy and in many instances disastrous results. The evil that a censorship creates is more malignant than the evil it seeks to avoid and conceal. If during the ensuing war the press should be censored and information as to the progress of the war should go to the public filtered through a censor, we would soon be living in a vapor of suspicion, a cloud of misinformation, a miasma of rumor.

A censorship of the press results in the diffusion and spread of misinformation and idle tales. Under a censorship sensational stories fly apparently on the wings of the wind. The ordinary citizen is practically helpless and knows not what or whom to believe. I do not mean to say that the press is always accurate in its gathering and presentation of facts, or always correct in its interpretation of facts, but in the main it attempts to be correct and seldom is willfully and wantonly unjust. A censorship proposed to be established with the intention and for the purpose of preventing our enemies from obtaining information as to the position and movement of our troops and fleets and the location of munition factories, machine shops, and details of coast defenses would, and no doubt should, meet with general approval.

The people composing the United States Government are now just about to enter upon a stupendous struggle. Events of world-wide importance are following each other so rapidly that they tread upon each other's heels; and sufficient events are transpiring each day to make volumes for the historian of the future.

I wish first to present my view of the censorship in respect to its being an unconstitutional statute as proposed.

The first amendment to the Federal Constitution reads as follows:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; * * *."

Everyone here knows what the word "abridging" means. I need not pause to consider or discuss the meaning of "abridgment."

What does "freedom of the press" mean? It is amazing to note the amount of loose talk—not in the Senate, but throughout the country and in the newspapers—as to what is "freedom of the press" as used in the Constitution of the United States. The average citizen of this Republic who is not a lawyer, from a constitutional standpoint, believes that "freedom of the press" means the right to publish his sentiments just as he pleases. In a large sense that may be true; but in a legalistic sense, and from a constitutional standpoint, that is not entirely accurate. "Freedom of the press" means simply, solely, and only the right to be free from a precensorship—the right to print and publish and have a judicial tribunal by due process of law declare after publication thereof whether or not the article was libelous, obscene, or improper. In other words, under the Constitution as amended by amendment no. 1, "freedom of the press" means that the citizen may publish whatever he sees fit and not be subjected to pains and penalties because he did not consult the censor before publishing. The citizen is left to publish what he pleases, and must take his chances before a court of his country as to whether or not he has published anything libelous or anything that may bring any human being into disrepute or ridicule, or whether he has published anything of a treasonable or obscene nature.

Now, to discover what this phrase "freedom of the press" means, we resort to that method to which lawyers have ever resorted, viz: What was the meaning of the phrase "freedom of the press" when the Constitution of the United States was adopted? When the first amendment was adopted, what did those who adopted the amendment, and what did the lawyers of that day say "freedom of the press" meant? What did the reports and the courts of the time say "freedom of the press" meant?

Mr. President, I believe that Sir William Blackstone is a good authority as to what is the common law of England; and the common law of England has been in force in this country since we have been a nation. It was brought to these shores by the migration hither of our ancestors. This book of Blackstone's Commentaries was written before the adoption of the first amendment, so it is presumed that those who adopted the amendment adopted it with the construction which Blackstone put upon its language and which the common law gave it. I read now from volume 4 of Wendell's Blackstone's Commentaries, page 151, where that great commentator says:

"In this and the other instances which we have lately considered, where blasphemous, immoral, treasonable, schismatical, seditious, or scandalous libels are punished by the English law, some with a greater, other with a less degree of severity, the liberty of the press, properly understood, is by no means infringed or violated. The liberty of the press is, indeed, essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications."

Let me read that again:

"But this— "

What? Freedom of the press—

"consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity."

Mr. President, I read no further just now but shall merely say that that was the law of England before we adopted the first amendment, and when we adopted that amendment we adopted the construction that previously had been placed upon such provision by the English courts. Therefore, it would seem that before we adopt any rule here, or attempt to pass any law looking toward a censorship, we should first ascertain what power we have on that subject.

The Senator from Louisiana undoubtedly has the right to bring a suit for damages or to seek the arrest of the persons, if any, who have unlawfully caused to be published and printed anything scandalous, libelous, or defamatory concerning him; and, strangely enough, under the law as I conceive it to exist, in our country, merely to write out a libel against another person and carry the libel in one's own pocket is contrary to the law. It is against the law to send a libelous letter even to one person, the person libeled. "Publication" of a libel does not mean publishing it in a newspaper alone.

If I should so far forget myself as to write an indecent, scandalous, and defamatory letter about another man, and even if that man should never see the letter, the mere writing of the same would be, nevertheless, a violation of the law of libel.

So before the Senate takes action looking to any precensorship we ought to consider whether we have such power. If the Senator from Louisiana has been libeled, and if he has been held up to ridicule and scorn, he would have the sympathy of right-thinking people if he brought a suit in the appropriate court.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. The case of Bernstein against Commercial National Bank reviews a large list of authorities; and in all privileged matters a conviction or recovery cannot be had except the utterer be shown by positive proof to be guilty of actual malice.

I am forced to agree with this comment of the Hearst papers that this is a privileged matter. I agree with the Senator that as to the party uttering it, if bad faith on his part could be shown by positive proof, that would destroy his privilege; but as to the newspaper's publishing it, there is no recourse whatever against the newspapers that publish the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. I have learned to respect the Senator's legal talent. The Senator is a valuable and active member of the Judiciary Committee. I do not agree with him, however, that privilege attaches to any such communication. The "privileges" known to law are very few—among them being privileged communications between physician and patient; priest and penitent; lawyer and client; husband and wife; words spoken in Senate and House and in legislatures, and so forth. The publication by the press of matter for good motives and for justifiable ends might be said to be nearly, if not entirely, privileged.

I have not examined the question of the privilege or so-called "privilege", if any, attaching to the communications sent to the Senate respecting the Senator from Louisiana, but I should say as a sidewalk of curbstone opinion that I pereceive no privilege attaching to such communications. Those who publish, do so at their peril.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I think it is important that the Senate should determine whether or not documents of this character, sent here, are privileged. If they are, we should amend our rules. If they are not, then we should take such action as is appropriate.

I wish someone would move that this matter be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think that is a proper suggestion. I move that the Committee on Privileges and Elections for the present be excused from consideration of the petition, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, the Senator having raised the question as to whether it is privileged and as to the right of the Senate to receive the petition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on Privileges and Elections is discharged, and the petition is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FRENCH PROPAGANDA IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, some days ago the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] referred to the recent and very extraordinary program of the French Government to spread French propaganda in the United States, for which the Chamber of Deputies voted a very large sum of money. About the same time I noted in the New York Herald Tribune a story by the United Press under a Paris date line of April 9, along the same line, suggesting that the propaganda was to include trans-Atlantic radio broadcasts, motion pictures, the press, magazines, and so forth, and a very significant paragraph in the foreign-office statement to the effect that—

> The American people are ignorant of their own history. They must not be expected to know French history.

The campaign outlined was:

1. Through the press, with the aid of the Agence Havas, the official French news agency.
2. The furthering of French motion pictures.
3. Sunday night broadcasts by wireless to the United States, via the British station at Rugby.
4. The writing of pro-French articles for American magazines, presumably by well-known authors.
5. The dispatch of lecturers and public speakers on missions to be directed by the home bureau.

Mr. President, there has just come to my hand a photostatic copy of the cover of the French official document "No. 295, Senate, 1932, ordinary session", being a report by M. Henry Bérenger, ambassador and reporter of the foreign affairs budget of 1932; and also photostatic copies of pages 97 and 98 of that report, chapter 39, showing the comment by M. Bérenger on the appropriation for "special funds for French information abroad."

There is also accompanying this photostatic copy a translation of pages 97 and 98, being chapter 39, of that document. I send them to the desk, Mr. President, and ask unanimous consent to have them printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(No. 295, Sénat année 1932, session ordinaire, annexe au procès-verbal de la 2e séance du 18 mars 1932)

RAPPORT FAIT AU NOM DE LA COMMISSION DES FINANCES CHARGÉE D'EXAMINER LE PROJET DE LOI, ADOPTÉ PAR LA CHAMBRE DES DÉPUTÉS, PORTANT FIXATION DU BUDGET GÉNÉRAL DE L'EXERCICE 1932—AFFAIRES ÉTRANGÈRES

Par M. Henry Bérenger, Sénateur

Le crédit se répartit de la façon suivante:	Francs
Impression des bulletins de presse étrangère	340,000
Abonnements aux journaux français	16,000
Abonnements aux journaux étrangers	86,000
Ouvrages techniques	3,000

CHAPITRE 39. Fonds spéciaux pour information française à l'étranger

	Francs
Crédit accordé par la dernière loi de finances	34,000,000
Crédit demandé par le Gouvernement:
12 mois	34,000,000
Exercice 1932	25,500,000
Crédit proposé par la Commission des finances de la Chambre	25,500,000
Crédit voté par la Chambre	25,500,000
Crédit proposé par la Commission des finances du Sénat	25,500,000

La dotation de ce chapitre avait été relevée, au budget dernier, de 8 millions, pour intensification de l'information française à l'étranger. Votre Commission des finances avait alors insisté sur la nécessité d'un contrôle rigoureux des subventions accordées. Conformément à cette décision, son rapporteur a examiné les conditions dans lesquelles ces subventions ont été utilisées.

L'effort du Département a porté spécialement sur la réorganisation des services extérieurs de nos agences d'information, notamment de l'Agence Havas. Certains bureaux à l'étranger de cet organisme ont été mis au point, notamment ceux des grandes capitales politiques (Berlin, Londres, Rome); d'autres ont été créés ou développés. Enfin, un service d'Extrême-Orient, hautement désirable dans les circonstances actuelles, a été inauguré en novembre (Shanghaï, et bientôt Pékin et Nankin).

Le résultat de cette réorganisation peut être apprécié d'après un petit nombre de faits: dans les journaux français, la proportion des informations Havas en provenance d'Allemagne, d'Espagne et d'Europe centrale a triplé; en Amérique du Sud, l'Agence Havas, presque évincée il y a un an, est en mesure de lutter avec les grandes agences des Etats-Unis; enfin, le service d'Extrême-Orient est accueilli par les journaux chinois, russes et aussi par la presse anglaise, d'abord réservée.

L'Agence Havas, par une modification au contrat de réciprocité existant, va aussi pouvoir créer un service indépendant aux Etats-Unis.

Ces développements, étudiés en accordance avec nos chefs de postes et avec le Département, sont l'objet d'un contrôle du Service d'informations et de presse.

De nouvelles extensions de notre programme de propagande par voie de la presse sont en cours d'examen et ne manqueront pas de faciliter l'action locale de nos chefs de postes et, d'une façon générale, la diffusion de l'influence française à l'étranger.

CHAPTER 39. Special fund for French information abroad

	Francs
Credits established by last finance law	34,000,000
Credits asked by Government, 12 months	34,000,000
Nine-month budget of 1932	25,500,000
Credits proposed by Finance Committee of Chamber	25,500,000
Credit voted by Chamber	25,500,000
Credits proposed by Finance Committee of Senate	25,500,000

The sums granted under this chapter were increased by eight millions in the previous budget for the intensification of publication of French information abroad. Your Finance Committee at that time insisted upon the necessity of a rigorous control of the subventions granted from these credits. Complying with this decision, your reporter examined the conditions under which these subventions have been used.

The effort of the department was concentrated on the reorganization of the foreign service of our news agencies, principally the Agence Havas. Certain bureaus of this organization abroad were improved, notably those in the great political capitals (Berlin, London, Rome); others were created or developed. In addition, a far-eastern service, highly desirable under existing circumstances, was inaugurated in November (Shanghai, and soon Peking and Nankin).

The result of this reorganization can be appreciated from the few followig facts: In the French press the proportion of Havas despatches originating in Germany, Spain, and central Europe were tripled; in South America the Agence Havas, almost evicted 1 year ago, is now in position to fight the great North American news agencies; finally, the far-eastern service is well received by the Chinese and Russian press and also by the English press there, which was at first cold to the project.

By a modification of the reciprocity contract now in existence the Agence Havas will also be able to create an independent service in the United States.

These developments, studied in common with the chiefs of posts and with the department, are the object of control by the Service of Information and Press (at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs).

Further extensions of our program of propaganda through the press are in process of examination and will not fail to facilitate the local action of our chiefs of posts and, in a general manner, the diffusion of French influence abroad.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I mention also, Mr. President, that some days ago I wrote the State Department asking for whatever information could be given with reference to this French propaganda. I think the American people ought to know just as much as possible about what they propose to do.

Mr. President, before I resume my seat permit me also to refer to an editorial that appeared in the Washington Post last Sunday, April 8, under the caption "Britain's Gold Supply." During the past several weeks we have heard on all sides that Great Britain would be unable to meet her June payment to the United States because of the fact that her gold supply was completely depleted and her capacity to pay very decidedly limited. Some of us believed then, Mr. President, that that was not true. It now develops that Great Britain has more gold than she knows what to do with, that she has greatly increased her capacity to pay. I quote from this editorial the following:

Britain has all the credit she needs, and her gold supply is getting so large as to be embarrassing.

What excuse can the British Government put forward for either postponement of the June war-debt payment or for a scaling down of the debt?

In fact—

The last report from London indicates—that the British Central Bank has about $860,000,000 in gold. This is slightly more than the bank held when the gold supply of Great Britain reached a previous peak in the fall of 1928.

Says this editorial—

So I think that dissipates, Mr. President, any argument that might be made to the effect that Great Britain has not the capacity to pay or that her limited gold supply will make it impossible for her to pay. The fact is she is in excellent condition, comparatively, of course, and should pay her debt installments regularly as she has agreed to pay. So should France.

Mr. President, all the French propaganda in the world in this country will not eliminate the fact that she thus far has refused to pay her honest debts. The best method for France to pursue in this country in order to gain the good will of the American people would be for her to pay up the defaulted installment on her debt and then continue to make her payments regularly, keep her word, and observe her treaties.

Mr. President, I ask that the editorial to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 9, 1933]

BRITAIN'S GOLD SUPPLY

Prominent among the subjects that President Roosevelt will discuss with Prime Minister MacDonald during the latter's visit to Washington will be restoration of the gold standard and Britain's war debt to American taxpayers. Both problems are vital elements of the world-wide economic situation. Solution of both is essential to the success of the world economic conference.

When Great Britain paid her war-debt installment last December, it was virtually announced that no further payments would be made unless the entire debt structure were revised. But a great deal of water has gone over the dam since then. Among other things the United States has experienced a banking crisis and acquired another huge deficit, while Great Britain has greatly increased her capacity to pay. It would be unfair to the British Government to assume that its policy has remained the same under such sweeping changes in circumstances.

A few months ago Great Britain made a powerful plea for revision of the debts on the ground that she had no gold from which payment could be made without crippling her financial structure. Now that situation has completely changed. The gold holdings of the Bank of England are the highest in its history, in spite of the large payment made to the United States 4 months ago. The last report from London indicates that the British central bank has about $860,000,000 in gold. This is slightly more than the bank held when the gold supply of Great Britain reached a previous peak in the fall of 1928.

It is also reported that the MacDonald government is selling British securities in large volumes to offset the inflationary tendency of this large gold supply. Interest rates on such treasury bills are so low as to be negligible. Britain has all the credit she needs and her gold supply is getting so large as to be embarrassing.

What excuse can the British Government put forward for either postponement of the June war-debt payment or for a scaling down of the debt? The United States needs this money far more than Great Britain does at present. Does Prime Minister MacDonald bring the good tidings that Britain will meet her obligations without complaint as an example to the other debtor nations? If so, his visit will be doubly welcome.

The return of Great Britain to the gold standard is also important. It is apparent that her gold supply is sufficient to consider that step as a means of restoring world confidence. Several other nations would follow Britain's lead back to the gold standard and most of the world would be on a sound monetary basis again. It may take some time for British officials to decide at what point they wish to stabilize the pound, but that can probably be worked out without a great deal of difficulty. Great Britain's accumulation of a new gold supply gives impetus to the whole program for monetary stabilization.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, on yesterday the very able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], with his usual ability, resourcefulness, and persuasiveness, made an attack both upon the constitutionality of this bill and upon its general philosophy.

I desire in a brief way to submit some observations which indicate, at least to my mind, that the very able Senator has not familiarized himself with the provisions of this bill in that degree which he would do in the examination of facts for the preparation and argument of a case for a client. Several, at least, of the major premises upon which his argument was based are not supported, as I construe the bill, by any direct provisions in it, or the proper and reasonable implications that can be drawn from it.

I desire first to take some notice of the Senator's constitutional argument, with the preliminary statement that I have had no opportunity to refresh myself upon the books. The principles involved are familiar to most lawyers.

The Senator's first point on the constitutionality of this bill was based upon the assertion that it is a price-fixing bill.

In the first place, Mr. President, I say that that assertion is not supported by the provisions of this bill, except the amendment known as the "Simpson amendment." The original bill, as proposed by the administration, has in it no provision for fixing prices. It provides that the policy is—

> To establish and maintain such balance between the production and consumption of agricultural commodities, and such marketing conditions therefor, as will reestablish prices to farmers at a level that will give agricultural commodities a purchasing power * * * equivalent to the purchasing power of agricultural commodities in the base period.

That does not fix by law a price on any commodity mentioned in the bill. On the contrary, it specifically declares that the policy of the bill is to make effective the old trade law of supply and demand, to establish and maintain the balance between production and consumption.

No economist will deny the proposition that the price of any commodity is governed by the law of supply and demand in the long run, and that the quality of the supply determines the effective operation of the law of supply and demand.

All of us who have familiarized ourselves with the subject know that an excessive supply of agricultural commodities has driven down the market price of those commodities. Why have they been driven down below the level of industrial commodities? It is because the great number of unorganized farmers have been unable effectively to control the supply offered on the market. Industry, with its smaller number of units, with its closer organization, is in position to and does stop production, stop offering on the market its products when the effective demand and paying power for them has been exhausted; and in that way the price of industrial commodities has been held at a level 50 percent higher than that of the products of the farm.

This is not, as I stated, a price-fixing bill, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has so positively asserted. It is a bill solely to put the farmers in position, through the operation of this law and through the cooperation and direction of the Department of Agriculture, to bring into effective force not a price-fixing but a price which a proper control of the supply in accordance with the demand will produce. When that is done, when supply is so controlled as to get a proper price in accordance with the demand for it, there is no reason why agricultural commodities should not naturally rise to the level of industrial commodities which existed during the pre-war period.

The steel mills and other manufacturing plants in the State of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania do not proceed as he would have the farmers do. He protested against a reduction in production of agricultural commodities, although we know the depressing effect that unrestricted production has upon the price of those commodities; but when we go into the industries of his city and his State we do not find the steel mills making all the steel their plants and their laborers can produce. We do not find them making, and I have not heard the able and distinguished Senator insist that they should make, all the steel they are equipped to make, and selling it for whatever it will bring in the market, as he evidently wants the farmers to do with the farm commodities.

But, Mr. President, discussing the matter from the standpoint of the Senator's argument that this is a price-fixing bill, it is perfectly clear from the provisions of this bill, with the exception of the last amendment made to it, that there is no price-fixing by law, notwithstanding the vigorous assertion and argument based thereon by the very able Senator from Pennsylvania.

If it is a price-fixing measure, let us see whether it is unquestionably unconstitutional, as has been asserted by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. I believe, and frankly stated, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, known as the "Simpson plan", in its original form was unconstitutional. But when it was amended so as to apply only to products moving in interstate commerce, then I submit an entirely different question was presented, and to my mind it brought that measure most likely within the power granted to Congress to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign countries.

If Congress, as the exclusive and sole judge, and not exercising the power capriciously or arbitrarily, deems it in the public interest to so regulate commerce, to so control it, as to bring benefit to the people of this country and to commerce itself, then I submit that, under the power granted to Congress, a broad and plenary power, it is most likely that any regulation which Congress deemed best for the interest of general commerce would be sustained under our Constitution.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has raised one question which is serious—that is, the right to tax one to pay another. That direct question twice went to the Supreme Court of the United States under what is known as the "sugar bounty law", a law under which sugar producers were paid 2 cents a pound directly out of the Treasury of the United States. The Supreme Court in each case recognized it as an important principle, whether or not it did violate the Constitution, but, although it had the opportunity to do so, and if it was so openly and flagrantly in violation of the Constitution doubtless it would have peremptorily said so, in each case the Supreme Court declined to pass upon that specific question, and ruled on some other point involved in the case.

What was the object of the oleomargarine tax, a tax of 10 cents a pound imposed by the Congress and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States? The object of the tax was to benefit competitors, to benefit the dairyman. Everybody knew it. It was asserted upon the floor time and time again that that was the object and purpose of the bill. When the case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, it said that in reviewing the action of Congress in assessing a tax which it was specifically authorized under the Constitution to assess, the Court would not look to the purpose of the Congress in assessing the tax, although the tax went for the benefit of certain competing interests, as everybody knew. So I submit, Mr. President, that on the principle laid down in the oleomargarine case, the argument presented by the Senator on that question will fall to the ground.

The Senator says that under the pending bill there would be a delegation of the taxing power, and that that is another reason for finding it unconstitutional. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas, in opening the debate, or in its early stages, completely disposed of that question, and presented a decision which is carried in his speech, a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, which effectively deals with the subject of the delegation of power by Congress to an executive agency of this Government.

The Senator from Pennsylvania says the bill is unconstitutional because of its flexibility, but he fails to recall that the flexible clause in the tariff law, which he supported and which he still supports, provided for a very wide range of flexibility to be vested in the President to increase or reduce the amount of a tax, and that delegation, as we all know, has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The distinguished Senator from Vermont raised a constitutional question which the Senator from Pennsylvania promptly seized upon and added to his list of the grounds upon which he rested his objections to the constitutionality of the bill. The Senator from Vermont referred to article 1, section 9, clause 5 of the Constitution, which provides:

> No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

In the first place, Mr. President, no tax is laid by the bill on articles exported from any State. The mere fact that a tax is levied within the State does not constitute a tax levied on articles exported, because that means that the tax is a tax based upon exportation. If the argument presented in that regard should be accepted, then no State could levy a tax of any sort upon anything that was destined to go into some other State or to some foreign country. But that question has been disposed of by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Dooley v. The United States (183 U.S.), in which case the Court said:

> The word "export" as used in this clause applies only to goods exported to a foreign country.

It has no application to interstate movement, and those familiar with the bill know that there is no tax of any kind upon any of these commodities which go to a foreign country, because the tax is to be refunded upon all commodities which go abroad. So that the Supreme Court, as well as the facts, dispose of that argument.

The vote of the Senate on yesterday is a complete answer to the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania. After arguments relating to the unconstitutionality of the Simpson plan, the most doubtful provision in the bill, as we all know, a very substantial majority answered the argument with their votes, and, naturally, they believed that they were not violating their duty to support the Constitution in casting that vote.

Now, I want to discuss for a little the philosophy of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I regret that he did not have the patience to remain in the Chamber. I think some Members of the Senate grievously misunderstand the provisions of the bill, and I classify the Senator from Pennsylvania as one of them. Yesterday he painted a horrible picture of Bill Smith and Tom Jones, Bill Smith getting benefits under the wheat-allotment plan, for instance, and then saying that the Department would go out to Tom Jones, who did not plant any wheat last year, and tell him that he should plant no wheat next year.

It seems almost incredible that the very able Senator from Pennsylvania could draw any such inference from anything in the bill. It has been stated from time to time on the floor of the Senate that there is no provision in the bill, either by direction or implication, which places any compulsion upon any farmer in the United States. The whole philosophy of the bill is one of voluntary action upon the part of the producer, of cooperation of the farmer with the Government in the administration of the law, and in the declared policy of reestablishing effectively the law of supply and demand.

The only powers here are powers to lease land and to establish an excise tax for benefits to be paid to the farmer under what is called the "allotment plan." If a farmer is willing to lease his land under the leasing power, who can say that there is any compulsion in that, although, forsooth, one of the conditions of making a lease is an agreement that he shall not, during the time the Government has the right to the possession of his land, under a paid rental, produce articles on that leased land the production of which is sought to be reduced. Whatever the farmer does under any rental plan he does voluntarily and because of benefits to him, benefits not only in the payment of rentals but benefits, as he knows, in reducing the great surpluses of the commodity he is producing. So, why should an effort be made here either to confuse the minds of Senators or to confuse the public, away from the hearings in the Senate Chamber, to establish the thought, by assertions such as have been made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Government could go out and tell John Jones that he could not use his land next year in any way in which he wanted to use it?

Is there any compulsion under the allotment benefit plan? I have heard no Senator point out any form of compulsion of any sort.

As the allotment plan is generally understood, it is a benefit to be paid to the farmer at the time he markets his crop. That benefit, of course, may be conditioned upon—and doubtless will be, if the plan shall be effective—a reduction in his production, but it must be borne in mind that no farmer is obliged to accept the benefits of the allotment plan; it is purely voluntary with each farmer whether he wants to go under the allotment plan or to stay out from under it and operate his farm as he has always done. I ask any Senator where is there any justification in anything written into this bill for the repeated assertions here that, if enacted, it will enslave the farmers by virtue of an autocratic power vested in the Government to control their own operations on their own farms.

I regret, Mr. President, the note of strife and conflict struck by the Senator from Pennsylvania yesterday when he raised an issue seeking to array industrial employees against the tillers of the soil. I was disappointed in that position taken by the able Senator, in view of the many arguments he has made upon this floor and elsewhere that the welfare of the farmer depended upon the earning power of the industrial employees, and thus their ability to provide a market for the products of the farm. That is the basis of every protective tariff argument that has ever been made when addressed to the agricultural sections of the country. When it is asserted by a farmer that he gets no direct benefits from protective tariff, "Oh", they say, "you do get an indirect benefit, because by the maintenance of prosperity in the industrial field a market is created for the producers on the farm." Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania ignores the reverse of that proposition in his appeal here, in his leadership, I may say, to establish a line of clevage between the residents of the industrial sections and those of the agricultural districts. He ignores the proposition that if prosperity in the industrial centers gives purchasing power and a consuming market for the products of agriculture, of necessity purchasing power by the farmer operates in exactly the same way and gives an equivalent purchasing power for the products of industry.

Ah, Mr. President, it was sad to hear the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, whose ability is recognized everywhere, assert that this bill was for the benefit of the farmers in the upper Mississippi Valley and in Texas and would be destructive of the interests of those in the industrial centers; and he turned to his colleagues from the East and asked them how they were going back home and explain to their constituents their votes for the bill.

Mr. President, I heard no protests by representatives of agricultural areas when bills were pending here and were voted upon and passed for the relief of suffering and destitute industrial workers. When we passed the unemployment emergency relief bill providing, first, $300,000,000, and later, at this session, $500,000,000, to be spent primarily not for the relief of the farmer but for the relief of the destitute and unemployed in the industrial centers, there was raised no protest of sectionalism, of class, as has been raised here by the Senator from Pennsylvania. In fact, Mr. President, we had to pass those bills over the protest of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but I have not heard of any failure on the part of the duly elected agencies of his State to take advantage of their benefits. Almost the day after the bill passed we found the Governor of the State of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania clamoring at the doors of the Treasury for $45,000,000 of that money; and I think he got it; we were glad to give it to him. When distress is abroad, when suffering prevails, who can have the heart to say, "No; those who are suffering are not in my class; they are not in the group with which I am associated; I will not aid them?" That is a philosophy and a type of humanitarianism which I cannot accept.

In my own State, Mr. President, I live in an industrial area, in the great Birmingham district. I am not here speaking solely for the interests of the farmer. I know as well as I know any rule of economics that if we can raise the price of our agricultural products we shall start the wheels of industry turning in the Birmingham district and in the other industrial sections of the country.

In the bill before us is involved a group which produces all the wealth of this Nation except that which is produced by the mines; here is the origin of wealth and the purchasing power; and notwithstanding the fact that a very small proportion of the increased cost is passed on to the consumer, under all past experience, we find gentlemen from industrial sections protesting that they are unwilling to vote to restore purchasing power to 50,000,000 American citizens. They talk about reestablishing foreign markets—and who is not interested in that subject?—but, Mr. President, with nearly half the population of America, including the freest spenders of all our citizens, absolutely deprived of purchasing power, with the market for the industries of this country almost swept away because of the loss of consuming power by 44 per cent of our population, I submit that any true economist who will reason will promptly conclude that, instead of troubling about a market for 10 percent of our production, the first step to take is to reinstate a market for the 50 or 60 percent of our domestic consumption which has been lost by reason of the unfortunate financial situation of America.

There are, Mr. President, many phases of this matter with which I should like to deal, in answer to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, but I am not going to take up the time to do so. I merely want the record made clear upon some of these subjects.

However, I do wish to say further that it is exceedingly unfortunate for anyone to try to raise in this country at this time a feeling of strife and hostility between the people in the cities and those in the towns in the country. Take wheat, for instance. A loaf of bread will not by reason of the passage of this bill be increased in price one half a cent. There is too much cost in the distribution from the time the wheat leaves the farm.

It has been disclosed by an investigating committee of the Senate extending over a long period that less than one half a cent's worth of flour goes into a loaf of bread, and while the price of wheat may fluctuate up and down as much as 50 or 60 cents a bushel the price of a loaf of bread is not changed by such fluctuations as much as one half cent a pound. Take the case of the cotton farmer. A cotton shirt costing a dollar contains about 3 or 4 cents' worth of cotton, according to the price paid to the farmer. So I submit, Mr. President, that an increase in the price of agricultural commodities will not place any undue burden upon the consumer, because there is already too much taken up in distribution which can be squeezed out of that process, as has been done in the past.

Mr. President, we in this country are a homogeneous people; our interests are the same. The people of the Birmingham coal and iron district have identical interests with the farmers in the Cotton Belt of Alabama. The people in Pittsburgh, the great steel center of our country, have a common interest with the farmers in the upper Mississippi Valley and in Texas, the sections referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania. We not only have a common patriotic interest to rescue this country from its present depression; we not only have a common economic interest in restoring commodity prices, in restoring consuming power, in restoring employment opportunities; but we have a feeling of brotherhood widespread and everywhere in this country.

Our people during all this great distress have been enduring and patient and patriotic. They are looking to the Congress for some form of relief. We have here a plan which offers it. The fear of the Senator from Pennsylvania is that it will be too effective instead of not sufficiently beneficial in raising the price of the farmer's commodities. Some argue that it will not help the farmer. The Senator from Pennsylvania says it will help the farmer so much that Senators from the industrial centers cannot afford to vote for it and go back home and tell their own people they did so vote. I should like to have a little consistency in the argument of those who are in opposition to the bill. But with a spirit of cooperation which now prevails not only between the farmers and the administration upon the subject, but the processors and packers and millers, we are exceedingly hopeful that beneficial results will accrue not only to the farmers but to the industrialists as well.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have taken very little time during the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, except to make some inquiries in regard to it. I have desisted from entering into a discussion of the bill primarily to await the consideration and final disposition of the various amendments. But I find that it is going to be necessary for me to be absent from the Chamber for a day or two, and for that reason I want to address myself now not to any particular amendment but to the bill itself.

I think I can agree with all that has been said on either side of the aisle as to the desperate condition of agriculture. It is not unlike the condition of other industries. Unfortunately, however, agriculture is first to feel the effect of a depression and usually the last to get out from under it. For that reason sympathy naturally will go to the farmer when he is in distress. I confess it would be nothing but a waste of time for me to repeat anything that has been said about the condition of agriculture. It is well known and nothing is to be added by repeating it. That is not only true now but it has been true for quite a period.

Congress has been and is now most sympathetic with agriculture. No question can be raised as to whether there has been any effort by legislation to relieve the condition of agriculture. I have always taken the position that agriculture should be included in any program looking to adjustments on the basis of insuring higher prices. For that reason I have always insisted that agriculture should be one of the primary factors in the consideration of all protective-tariff legislation. Those who assert that in tariff legislation we have discriminated against agriculture speak from a different philosophy, if not fund of information, than that from which I would speak, because the facts are that agriculture has always been regarded of primary importance when we come to consider that sort of legislation.

In the last tariff act the percentage of increase on agricultural products comprehended nearly the total increase involved in the legislation. When anyone says to me, "What are you going to do for agriculture, since you have done something for industry?" my reply is that we do nothing for industry that we have not done in the same way for agriculture. The reply to that generally is, "But your protective tariff is effective on industry, while it is not effective on agriculture."

There is some force to that argument as to the items of which we produce a surplus, but it is only a half-truth. It is not wholly true. I have been told that there is no advantage to come from the tariff upon wheat. The argument has been made that it is easily demonstrated that there is no advantage because the tariff is almost as much as the price of wheat now. Nobody knows the useful effect of the protection of that article more intensely than the present Presiding Officer, the Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON], who lives in a State interested in this particular commodity. When it is asserted that this has no effect on wheat, the facts are wholly ignored. For example, we produce 800,000,000 bushels of wheat. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] put some figures in the RECORD some weeks ago when he made an admirable address dealing with the facts relating to wheat. He said:

> Now, let us view wheat production from the world standpoint. In the pre-war period, 1909–10 to 1913–14, the average production was 3,041,000,000 bushels. For the period from 1921–22 to 1925–26 that average increased 300,000,000 bushels. For the period from 1928–29 to 1931–32, the last 4 years, wheat production increased to 3,783,000,000 bushels, or more than 700,000,000 bushels in excess of the average production during the pre-war period of 5 years.

Then, speaking of Canada, he said:

> I have pointed out that in the United States the production of wheat increased from 690,000,000 bushels to 869,000,000 bushels during the last 4 years, an increase of nearly 200,000,000 bushels. In Canada, during the pre-war period, the production was 197,000,000 bushels. During the last 4 years it has gone from 197,000,000 bushels to 399,000,000 bushels, an increase of 200,000,000 bushels.

Mr. President, 399,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat means a surplus of over 350,000,000 bushels that Canada, a country of 8½ million people, must sell outside of her own borders, while 200,000,000 bushels surplus of wheat in this country would be 200,000,000 bushels for 120,000,000 people. That means an exportable surplus in the United States of only 1.4 bushels per capita, while in Canada it means a surplus of 43 bushels of wheat per capita. I mention that for the reason that Canada must sell her wheat. It is a cash product. Out of the 399,000,000 she produces she consumes only about 50,000,000 bushels. That means about 350,000,000 bushels must be sold in the world market outside of Canada. If she be compelled to sell it in Liverpool, it would be at the world market price, plus the cost of transportation from Canada to Liverpool. If the world market was 22 cents below the market in the United States, Canada could easily afford and would certainly ship her wheat across the line into the United States. In other words, she must dispose of that tremendous surplus at any price, no matter how low, and if she can get only 40 cents in Liverpool, she could better afford to sell it for 35 cents in Minneapolis, because it would be to her advantage in avoiding payment of the transportation charges. Did we not protect our wheat grower by a tariff, Canada would ship wheat across the line at a price below the Liverpool price.

In that situation, to say that a tariff on wheat has no effect is an absurd statement on its face. When we talk about giving protection to an article like wheat there is no argument whatever that it would not be effective in a case such as faces us right now. That was my answer when I said to a friend of mine that I always include the farmer in any legislation looking to the enhancement of industry and the employment of labor in the United States.

Mr. President, no one in his sound mind is going to assert that there has been no effort on the part of Congress to aid the farmer. In fact, Congress has attempted by legislation what I doubt very much can be effected. I have been in Congress now for 20 years. That has been during the period when we have been so active in legislation on behalf of agriculture. I hold in my hand a compilation published in 1931 under the direction of Mr. Lewis, a member of the Government, being a collection of the laws relating to agriculture. The volume contains 267 pages. That volume reprints 123 different laws relating to agriculture. It does not include the laws relating to agricultural credits. Almost all of these laws, except a mere half dozen, have been enacted since I came to the Congress 20 years ago. These laws cover the various situations in which the farmer found himself. Every one of these laws, for most of which I voted, for some of which I voted under protest, was strongly endorsed by the best agricultural minds of the country through the representatives of the farm organizations domiciled here in Washington.

For years I have found it convenient, when it comes to legislation on a subject of this kind, to consult with experts as to whether the proposal is wise or otherwise. This vast body of legislative enactments contained in the volume to which I have referred represents laws placed upon the statute books in answer to the demands of the farming elements and were enacted readily in response to their request. They are now on the statute books and in operation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ERICKSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator give us the number of the document to which he has referred? Is it a public document?

Mr. FESS. It is a public document compiled by Elmer A. Lewis, superintendent of the document room of the House of Representatives, Washington, 1931.

Mr. FLETCHER. Can the Senator give us the number and the Congress?

Mr. FESS. It does not seem to have a number. I refer to this compilation of laws, Mr. President, only to indicate the response that Congress, both House and Senate, with the approval of the Presidents, from 1912 up to the present time, has made to requests to put upon the statute books measures for the relief of agriculture.

What is the situation of agriculture in the face of that legislation today?

I do not know whether or not I am justified in saying that the farmer would have been much better off if he had been let alone. I am of opinion that he would be better off if some of these laws were not on the statute books; yet every law was supported with the greatest sincerity and good will, and all of them were endorsed by the people whose judgments we have a right to respect when matters of legislation of this particular character come up.

This compilation does not include the body of law for agricultural credit. I have the compilation of that body of law, printed at the same time, compiled by the same author, the superintendent of public documents of the House of Representatives. There are 13 of these laws, and they contain the actual print of 79 pages of legal enactments. These laws, again, were enacted in response to a general desire that the farmer should be put on the same basis in credit as the business man. We went through all of that argument in the original enactment of the farm land bank law, in the creation of the Farm Loan Board, in the creation of the joint-stock land banks that were a part of the farm land bank legislation, in the creation of the intermediate credit system that was inaugurated in order to increase credit facilities to the farmer.

I stated on the floor of the House of Representatives when the first one of these measures was introduced that I did not believe the bill as then introduced and finally passed would be of any particular advantage to the farmer in Ohio; but I was told that in certain States of the Union the credit facilities were not adequate and that the farmer needed something of this sort, and with some reluctance I voted for these acts to provide for the farmer credit facilities as now written into law.

The argument appealed to me tremendously, that here are a young man and a young woman starting out in life. They ought to be permitted, if they are people of industry and frugality, to have the way opened by the Government for them to purchase a farm; and instead of paying a rental on a rented farm, as they would have to pay if they were tenants, the way ought to be opened for them to pay on an amortization plan a certain amount, say for 36 years, at the end of which time they would own the farm. Instead of having paid rent all the years and at the end of the time being turned out, they would own the farm on which they otherwise would have been paying rent.

I admit that that argument appealed to me tremendously and was somewhat conclusive; but no sooner did we open the way for loaning for the purchase of a farm than it was said that it did not include improvements on the farm and that the loaning privilege should be extended to improvements. When that was done we were asked to provide means for borrowing to stock the farm. Then the authorization was not limited to borrowing for livestock or stocking the farm, but it was extended to permit borrowing to procure seed to plant the farm. Nobody thought of such a thing when we inaugurated this credit facility. In other words, we opened the way to make it easier for a farmer to borrow without much regard to how he was going to pay when pay day came; and what has been the outcome? Note his present situation.

Today the farmer has borrowed on the farm. He has borrowed on the improvements. He has borrowed on stocking the farm. He has borrowed on seeding it. As a consequence, some of them are in a hopeless mortgage situation; and we now have reached a point where we feel that if we can relieve that mortgage situation we ought to do it. Without a doubt there will be quite a general response on the part of Congress to the appeal for action in some form to help relieve that situation.

I do not know whether the present amendment to the bill will be effective and safe or not. It certainly is a long step we propose to take; but it is the only thing that has been suggested. I frankly state that I have tremendous sympathy with the effort in some way to relieve the farmer in regard to this particular obligation; but I am not unaware of how he got into his present position.

Here is a friend of mine who is my neighbor at home. He listened to his son, not as conservative as his father, not as cautious in incurring obligations. The father goes to the bank down in Louisville and borrows $5,000 on his farm. He mortgages a good farm. He takes the $5,000 and builds a silo. Then, unfortunately, he uses the rest of the money to improve the house in which he lives, and to build a brick wall around the yard. In other words, outside of the expenditure for the silo, the $5,000 has been invested in ways that will not bring him a single dollar of additional income. He called at my home and told me he could not pay the interest, and he is very, very much disturbed because I do not see any way by which he can avoid losing that farm.

Here is another neighbor of mine who owns one farm of 600 acres and an adjoining farm of 400 acres—a thousand acres, all told. He moves into town and leaves his two boys, college-bred to run the farm. They decide on going into fancy livestock, and they mortgage their farm on some venture like that. What is the consequence?

I could multiply those instances by thousands. I am in sympathy with trying to help relieve the condition if I can; but Congress must not give any promise that it is going to act as the almoner of every person who under the law has embraced an opportunity in which he has gone beyond his depth. That is not safe.

I mention this to indicate to you that in our desire to make credit facilities more open and more readily secured, we have made it possible for many people to go beyond their depth, and we are now asked to relieve them.

I admit that the depths to which they have gone are not altogether due to themselves. The obligation, of course, is due to themselves, but the loss in the productiveness of the farm by a price decline is not entirely due to them; and that makes the question a very difficult one.

My farmers are constantly asking, "Why do you not reduce the taxes? They are fixed, and we cannot get rid of them." The farmer had thought that the taxes that burdened him were taxes laid upon him at Washington. That is an error. While in Washington we reduced the taxes one third per capita until the depression set in, the States increased their taxation three times—at least, mine did, and I think most of them did. The farmer must be relieved somewhat of this burden of taxation; but that is the function of the State, and not the function of Washington.

We might help on the interest charge. That, I think, could be a phase of Federal legislation. We could help on the establishment of principles of bankruptcy so that the farmers might have an extension of time, or something of that kind. That, I think, would be within our province. When it comes to talking about relieving the farmer of taxation, however, the relief must come through the State legislatures that are constantly increasing taxation, and doing it not necessarily at the request of the farmer, but with his assent.

I have suggested that the States might make a shift. Since we are bound to have Federal highways—or rather national highways; they are partially Federal—since we are bound to have good schools, and we are bound to have improvements in the States—and we all want them—I think it is absolutely inevitable that the States must make some provision by which taxes may be partially shifted from the farmer to other property owners. That, I think, must come; but that will come through the State and not from Washington.

I say that much to indicate to the Senate the problem that faces us, and how we have gotten into this situation.

In this mass of legislation that has been proposed, some was proposed that I did not vote for. The equalization fee that was presented by the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] I could not support, but not because it was unsound economically. I think, and stated at the time, that the equalization fee that dealt with the surplus, that placed upon the man who was to get the benefit of the law the burden of suffering any loss in the disposition of the surplus, was a sound proposal, because the penalty that would be attached would be a deterrent against overproduction, if there could be any deterrent.

My opposition to the equalization-fee plan was that in my judgment it was not only unworkable but that it would create such an enormous bureau, and would not only do that but would ultimately produce a terrific revulsion of sentiment in the country against it. That is one of the proposals that was discussed here at length, which did not become a law, and for which I did not vote.

The debenture plan did not become a law, and I did not support that. It was a clear subsidy. It had this merit, however: that it was definite. Under it there would have been paid half the tariff, and the tariff is written into law. It is certain, it is not flexible, it is not one thing today and something else tomorrow. It is fixed until the law is changed. So that every producer would know just what amount of money he would get on that part of his product that was exported. It had that merit; but it had several demerits, to which attention was called, and I did not support it.

Mr. President, in the partial failure of the operation of the laws we had already enacted, and in the failure to enact these two plans, the equalization-fee plan and the debenture plan, both parties went to the country in 1928 with a pledge to relieve agriculture. The principle announced was that agriculture should be brought up to a parity with other industries.

Mr. President, that is a very difficult thing to do. Agriculture is different from all other industries. Most industries are a matter of quick turnover. Many industries have a complete turnover every 3 months. Agriculture cannot have a turnover except once a year, outside of the poultry business, and we might say also in the case of a certain grade of livestock.

It is very difficult, if not impossible, to bring agriculture, an industry of slow turnover, to an equality with other industries with a quick turnover. Think of the automobile industry, how quickly a car can be produced. It is sold and then they are ready to go ahead with unlimited capacity to produce. We cannot bring agriculture to a parity with that kind of an industry. No legislation would do it, no matter how many laws we enacted.

The Democratic Party made its announcement on agriculture in 1928, and the Republican Party made its announcement. The Republican Party took the position that the thing to be done was to aid the farmer to solve his own problem, and in order to do that it enlarged the principle of collective bargaining by the enactment of the Marketing Act. The Marketing Act did only two things: First, it gave authority to create marketing associations, with adjunctive power of establishing stabilization organizations, and with a sufficient capital provided by the Government to make it effective.

My Democratic friends—and I want to stay wholly out of politics in this discussion—largely voted for the Marketing Act, and it was a consistent thing for them to do. The very first disappointment to me was that in the Senate there was put onto that measure the debenture plan. When the debenture plan was voted on, 21 Republicans voted for it and 33 Democrats. Twenty-one Republicans voted against it and two Democrats. So that the bill carrying the debenture plan was passed in this Chamber. It then went to the House of Representatives, and was sent to conference. In conference the debenture plan was taken out, and the bill came back to us. On the vote on the conference report, 39 Republicans voted for it and 4 Democrats, and 13 Republicans voted against it and 32 Democrats. So that the conference report, with the debenture plan out, failed in the Senate, and the bill went back to conference again. When it came back, with the debenture out, 74 voted for it and only 8 voted against it. The 74 was made up of 47 Republicans and 27 Democrats, and those against it were 3 Republicans and 5 Democrats. So that the final vote was a nonpartisan vote and pretty nearly unanimous. That is the history of the vote on the Marketing Act, also known as the "Farm Board Act."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Did the Senator say 74 voted for it?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator means voted for the conference report.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. That was not a distinct vote on the debenture.

Mr. FESS. No. Seventy-four voted for the conference report.

Our Democratic friends have criticized the Farm Board Act very vigorously. I do not blame them for their statement that they voted for it because it was an administration measure and it had not been possible to present anything else, and therefore they voted for it because there was nothing else for them to do. But I think our Democratic friends ought to recall their own plank on that particular question. Their plank in the platform of 1928 on the farm situation read as follows:

> Creation of a Federal farm board to assist the farmer and stock raiser in the marketing of their products, as the Federal Reserve Board has done for the banker and business man.

So that the creation of the Board was not merely a Republican idea; it was also a Democratic idea. The plank goes on to state why they wanted the Board created.

> Now, in the hour of agriculture's need, the Democratic Party pledges the establishment of a new agricultural policy fitted to present conditions under the direction of a farm board vested with all the powers necessary to accomplish for agriculture what the Federal Reserve Board has been able to accomplish for finance.

I mention that not to bring politics into the situation but especially to indicate that the board idea was not only a Republican idea but also a Democratic idea.

Mr. President, in the administration of the law there has been a lot of disappointment. I am not in position to say whether things would have been worse, and how much, if we had not had that legislation. Many people think they would have been much worse; they may have been. I am not in a position to say just how much we, as agriculturists, were able to secure out of this legislation. The farmers represented here in Washington were in favor of it. But I want especially to call attention to this fact, that the President of the United States, in the appointment of the Board, recognizing the tremendous responsibilities and the serious problems confronting him, took many weeks in the selection of the Board, with an entire omission of any consideration of whatever source except to benefit agriculture in the proper administration of the law. When I called upon the President on behalf of an Ohio farmer candidate, the President made it clear that my candidate did not measure up to his standard. The Board started out to enforce the law.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wonder whether the Senator from Ohio will agree with me that there was a concerted effort and propaganda to discredit the Farm Board and discredit the Farm Marketing Act.

Mr. FESS. I fully agree with that statement. I think that was quite evident in my own State, and for that reason I am not in position to state just how much good we got out of it or how much worse the condition would have been if we had not had the legislation.

I want to call attention to the care exercised in the selection of the Board in order to make the administration effective, in order to make the operation of the law a success. Those men, representing the particular commodities over which they had control, were certainly as well equipped as anyone who could have been found. I sat in a conference at one time and listened to a conversation like this when we were about to go into the market to buy wheat and cotton: It was asserted, as it had been asserted here on the floor, that we never would need to do that; that all that would be necessary would be to write into the law authority to do it, and that we would never need to exercise it. The theory of it was that if the dealers should know that the Federal Government had the authority to go into the market and buy wheat and cotton at a price which the Government would fix, the mere authority, without ever exercising it, would be sufficient to keep the price up. It was not.

Then when it was made clear that they would have to start actual buying the question was as to how much they should buy. It was thought that without doubt if they started to buy, so that the trade would see that the Government was doing it, there would be no necessity of buying more than five or ten million bushels of wheat. Yet we went on and bought to the extent of 200 million bushels, keeping the price of American wheat about 22 cents above what it was in Liverpool, until it became necessary to announce to the country that the Board would not follow that practice the next year. When that announcement was made the force of the Government's fiat was withdrawn and wheat went back with a bang, as everybody knew it would.

There was a board composed of men of the best ability that I know of, yet incapable, through their consultation power, to keep the price up to a certain figure, even though they went into the market and bought. That failed. What does the pending bill propose to do? It proposes to give to one man the power to do what, under the law, this aggregation of men could not do.

The fact was that the Farm Marketing Act did not please the public, and there was great opposition to it from various sources. Farmers were disappointed in the prices not being kept up, and both those interested in agriculture and general improvement began to study to determine what change should be made or what ought to be done. Have we gone toward the end? Is there any other way?

We heard in this Chamber time after time that the failure to keep the price of wheat above a dollar a bushel was due to the fact we did not buy all the wheat in the country; that if we had bought it all we could have fixed the price to suit ourselves. There were certain Members of the Senate as well as of the other House who thought we ought to go to that extent. Of course, I think that would be perfectly futile. I agree with the statement of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] in his reference to the effort of Brazil to valorize coffee and of Great Britain under the Stevenson Act to increase the price of rubber. It simply cannot be done as a permanent policy; it is an impossibility; and we certainly have abundant evidence of that inability and futility.

In the campaign last year I was very much interested in knowing what the policy of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, Mr. Roosevelt, would be. On the 14th of September, in the city of Topeka, he made his pronouncement on the question of farm relief. On September 15 the New York Times blocked on the front page the salient statements of that speech. I have read that speech, and the Presiding Officer, as well as every other Senator, will recall that it dealt wholly in negatives. It stated what the plan would not include without specifically stating what it would include. The then candidate for the Presidency said:

First—

I am taking this time, Mr. President, because everybody is extremely anxious to do what can be done to relieve the condition of the farmers if it is at all feasible; but I feel that I cannot be expected to do what, in my judgment, will do no good but will do harm. That is why I am taking this time.

First, the plan must provide for the producer of staple surplus products, such as wheat, cotton, corn in the form of hogs, and tobacco, a tariff benefit over world prices, which is equivalent to the benefit given by the tariff to industrial products, and that differential benefit must be so applied that the increase in the farm income purchasing and debt-paying power will not stimulate further production.

Mr. President, this bill abandons the idea of the tariff benefits. I am not criticizing it for that reason, because the bill is written on a different basis from that involved in the debenture plan, which was designed to give the tariff benefits; but I note this one statement of Mr. Roosevelt, that the bill must be so written that the increase in the income and in the debt-paying power to the farmer "will not stimulate further production." There is no possibility of increasing the debt-paying power of the farmer and the income of the farmer by legislation without stimulating his production, unless we pay out of the Treasury a subsidy in lieu of his production.

Second, the plan must finance itself.

This bill is written not on the basis of the plan financing itself, although primarily it might be said that it will do so; but it provides for advancements out of the funds of the Treasury; nobody has even attempted to say how much. The Secretary of Agriculture was asked about how much this proposal would cost, and he said it would probably cost $800,000,000; and that was a mere estimate. It is true that the bill is so written that there is to be a tax paid and turned over to the producers, and it is supposed that that will take care of the expenses; but the bill provides that there shall be advances out of the Treasury to insure against any deficit.

Third. It must not make use of any mechanism which would cause our European customers to retaliate on the ground of dumping.

I assume that that meant that it must not be a plan dealing only with surpluses. The debenture plan and the equalization plan did not deal with the portion of agricultural commodities consumed domestically; they dealt with the surplus. The surplus is the part to be dumped, and I assume that the candidate meant that the measure must be so written that it would not result in dumping. For that reason this bill is written on the basis of the domestic consumption rather than on the exportable surplus.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I notice that the Senator from Ohio stated that the Secretary of Agriculture said that it would cost $800,000,000 to administer this bill.

Mr. FESS. That statement was made in his radio address.

Mr. FRAZIER. On page 131 of the hearings which were held before the committee the Secretary states:

I have been quoted as stating that the operation of the measure will cost $800,000,000. I have made no such statement and the Department has made no such estimate.

Mr. FESS. I will accept that statement, but it was printed in all the newspapers that $800,000,000 would be the cost of the administration of this measure as estimated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FRAZIER. I know that statement was made, but I have quoted from the statement in the Secretary's own testimony given before the committee.

Mr. FESS. That is official, but the Senator from North Dakota will admit to me that it does not amount to a fig, when nobody knows what it is going to cost, not even the Secretary of Agriculture. It does not amount to anything.

Mr. FRAZIER. I, for one, should like to put a limit on the amount of cost on a percentage basis.

Mr. FESS. I think that would be a good feature.

Fourth—

I am still quoting from the Topeka speech—

It must make use of existing agencies and, so far as possible, be decentralized in its administration so that the chief responsibility for its success will rest with the localities of this country rather than with created bureaucratic machinery in Washington.

I think that probably the authors of the bill have tried to write that feature in it, but it certainly is not in the bill, as I shall show when I come to analyze it by sections. This bill erects a bureaucratic organization here in Washington. It has no limit in that respect; it is wholly within the wishes of one man, whatever he thinks may be necessary. It provides that he may use committees and associations in various localities; but the bill is so framed that there will be erected in the Agricultural Department, to say nothing about that to be attached to the Treasury Department, a bureau that will be equal to, if not greater than, any bureau we have now in Washington.

Fifth. It must operate as nearly as possible on a cooperative basis and its effect must be to enhance and strengthen a cooperative movement.

That is a justifiable position, because I do not believe that we are ever going to assist the farmer when he operates simply as an individual. It seems to me that he has got to be a part of a collective organization, and the cooperative feature, I think, therefore, is a valuable one.

Sixth. This plan must be, insofar as possible, voluntary. I like the idea that the plan should not be put into operation unless it has the support of a large, reasonable proportion of the producers of the exportable commodities to which it is to apply.

That feature is omitted in this bill. It was written originally in the bill that was first set up. It was provided in the original bill that it should not become operative unless 60 percent of those to be benefited approved it. This bill, however, omits that feature entirely.

Mr. President, not to be offensive, for certainly there is no ground for that, I think I can understand why the then distinguished Democratic candidate for President of the United States, and now the President, took the time to say what the bill should not contain, but not a moment to say what it should contain. It was that feature of his address about which I was much concerned. I do not care so much about what a bill may not have in it as what it actually does have in it. But, after reading this bill now before us, I know why the candidate did not specify what was to be in the bill. He could not know then, as he does not know now. There is nothing in the bill except a delegation of authority, and that authority is broad enough to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to explore any field of any sort that may come to his mind as being necessary to enter in order to revive agriculture. That statement is not irresponsible; that statement will be verified by an examination of this bill.

I think that I can agree with the distinguished chairman of the committee in his desire to provide some method for handling the stock of cotton now in the possession of the Farm Board. I have sympathy with him not only in his desire that that stock of cotton should be properly handled so far as the cotton producers are concerned but for the public generally, because I am of opinion that if we can get rid of that stock, it will be a benefit to all. There is one feature in that portion of the bill which I think ought to be eliminated. It is that provision which not only authorizes but directs the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to advance funds. I do not like the idea of a law directing one governmental agency to loan money to another without any discretion whatever. Such a provision is in this bill, and I doubt its wisdom, although I approve its purpose. When another bill was before the Senate on this subject that provision went out, but I see it has been put back in the pending bill. I pass over the cotton provision for the time being, but will come back to it later, when I shall want the attention of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. President, my primary objection to the bill is its revolutionary character. Subsection 2 of section 8, on page 7, provides the authority to trade in the commodities of the farmer.

We are writing into the law for the first time in the history of the Government a limitation on the freedom of the most stable citizen of America, the farmer, limiting him in his ability to care for his own business by the sale of his own product without first entering into an agreement under authority from Washington or by his purchaser obtaining a license from Washington. If the man who deals in the products of the farmer is willing to make an agreement with the Secretary of Agriculture, then he does not need a license. That agreement will represent the Government on the one hand and the dealer on the other hand. It is an agreement that dictates. It is not the result of a free exercise of mind to agree or disagree.

The agreement that is to take the place of the license is the most complete limitation on the individuality of the purchaser of American farm products. If he is willing to accept the dictation of the Secretary of Agriculture in the form of an agreement which is one-sided, then he does not need a license; but if he refuses to make such an agreement, then he has to stop business or discontinue the purchase of what he has had the right to purchase as long as his business has been in existence until he gets a permit in the form of a license from Washington. Never in the history of American business that deals with private matters has there been such an expansion of authority. But that is what is proposed here in the pending bill.

What are to be the terms of the license? Whatever the dictator may say. No one knows what the Secretary of Agriculture may decide in his last guess ought to be in it. How much does it include? Wheat? Yes. The other six articles mentioned in the bill? Yes. Anything else? Yes; everything. Nothing is excluded. I read:

> To issue licenses permitting processors, associations of producers, and others to engage in the handling, in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, of any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof, or any competing commodity or product thereof.

What does that include? It includes both commodities and the products of the commodities. How many commodities are named? Seven, as listed later in the bill. How many are covered? All of them, because it covers the whole gamut by saying, "Any competing commodity or product thereof." Are potatoes omitted? Certainly not. Potatoes can easily become a competitor of flour or wheat. It includes "competing" articles. Rayon may be declared not to be included, but it is included. Wool may be said not to be included, but it is included. There is nothing excluded except that which could not possibly be a competing article. When someone asks what can be a substitute for food, the reply is that everything is a substitute for food.

Mr. President, the idea that we are writing a law without terms or conditions mentioned, but existing, not yet matured, merely in the mind of somebody. The terms are not yet matured. We are writing this license with indeterminate features covering every article that can be known as "food" by including a competing article of food. That is proposed to be done in this legislation.

In the first place, I am sure the American farmer will revolt against this intrusion upon his rights to the extent that he may not sow his wheat or plant his corn or breed his stock without first getting a permit from Washington to do so. That is a new role that the American farmer is going to resist when it is undertaken to be put in operation.

Unfortunately there is no choice left to the man who is to buy the products because there is a penalty attached to a violation of the agreement or of the terms of the license.

The penalty is not only a revocation of the license but a thousand dollars fine each day during which the violation may continue. It is very difficult for me to understand how anyone can get the consent of his own mind to agree to tying down agriculture like that, punishing a dealer for buying an article of the farmer without a license to do so, and this to advance the price. There are additional burdens in subsection 4 of the same provision.

Mr. President, it is indeed revolutionary to create by act of Congress a dictator over this great industry made up of farmers, representing 30,000,000 of our population. A dictator is to be placed over the farmer in a complete denial of his individuality, which in the end must be so offensive to him that I suggest there will be a terrific adverse reaction when it becomes operative.

Not only that, but the particular taxing provision is probably the worst thing we have ever undertaken to write into legislation in this country. Taxation is a method employed for support of the public, including all citizens in the country levying the tax. This is the method employed from the beginning of civilized government. The time was, of course, when public taxation was not used, but it was prior to and including the feudal days when the public was not even considered. But when we reached the Anglo-Saxon view that every citizen was a part of the government and recognized as a partial bearer of the burdens of government, we adopted the public system of taxation. That became the Anglo-Saxon practice. We have been very jealous in keeping the taxing authority where it belongs, in the hands of the people—more jealous about that than any other subject with which we deal.

Senators are not oblivious to what caused the war of independence. It grew out of taxation. Senators are not oblivious to what produced the French Revolution. It was the subject of taxation. We wrote our Constitution following an accumulated series of events that constituted a struggle between the Government and the people. I have often thought, when I have been reading the lives of men like Gladstone, Chamberlain, Palmerston, and others, of those who covered the great reform era in Great Britain, and marked how they struggled to get certain reforms adopted, that we never had any struggle over such matters because they were fundamental with us and written in the beginning into our organic law. Take, for example, Gladstone, who was in Parliament 63 years, 5 times Chancellor of the Exchequer and 4 times Prime Minister, a record never achieved by any other man in the British Empire. He has to his credit a long list of great reforms, including, among others, the reform relating to general education. That reform was never fought out in this country because we made it a fundamental right at the beginning. Another reform related to the freedom of a person to go to a university without regard to his religious affiliations. It is difficult for us to realize that that was not accomplished in Great Britain until 1877, and yet for centuries we had built our Government on that fundamental principle as the most elemental of principles. The electoral reforms, including the privilege of franchise, ran through many stages in the last century.

So it goes. If we read of the successful efforts of those great statesmen in their efforts at reform, the striking fact will be found to be that notwithstanding their struggle covered a century of debate and effort, we never had it because we wrote those principles in the beginning in our organic law, the Constitution, or else the Bill of Rights, which constitutes the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. One of the things that we wrote in the organic law was that all bills creating revenue, the taxing feature, must originate in the House, because Members of the House were designed by the framers to represent the people and thus it would be the people doing it. We keep the right of taxation close to the people, and we have never permitted any deviation from it. Nowhere has it ever been attempted to delegate the power of taxation away from Congress. On yesterday the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] quoted the bristling debate of Democratic Senators on this subject. That is an unheard-of thing. It would even not be tolerated in Europe.

But what are we attempting to do here? It is proposed to violate every fundamental principle of this feature of the Constitution. We are asked to ignore the very genius upon which American liberty has been built. We are asked not only to give to an individual who is an appointive officer, with no responsibility to the people, the right to say what the tax shall be, but we are asked to give him the right as to the time to levy it and determine how it shall be collected, and then to grant him authority to provide for its expenditure before it is collected.

Mr. President, there never before has been in the wildest imaginings of the most fertile brain, any such proposal as is contemplated by the taxing section of this bill. Taxes must be clear. That is elemental; but here it is as clear as mud, because nobody knows what it is going to be.

Taxes must be certain. The only certain thing about this is its uncertainty, for it is in the mysticism of the brain of an appointive officer.

Not only that, but not a dollar can be gotten out of the Treasury except by an appropriation. The Constitution is specific on that point. Every bill, resolution, and so forth, that is designed to take money out of the Treasury must go through the two Houses and be signed by the President.

What does this bill do? The tax is not yet fixed. The tax is not yet collected. The tax is supposed to go to the Treasury; but the tax is taken out of the Treasury, in violation of the Constitution, by the act that authorizes it to be placed in the Treasury, the appropriation being made even before the tax is collected. Nothing like that has ever been suggested before, so far as I know, by anyone here in the United States nor in Europe.

To obtain revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of the existing national economic emergency, including expenditures for rental and benefit payments and adminstrative expenses under this title, there shall be levied processing taxes as hereinafter provided—

And so forth. What is the tax? We do not know. Notice the uncertainties in this section:

The rate of tax shall conform to the requirements of subsection (b). Such rate shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

It is not fixed. The Secretary of Agriculture does not know what it will be. The rate of tax, which is one of the subjects of greatest controversy upon questions of taxation, is to be left to an appointive officer.

Such rate shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture as of the date the tax first takes effect, and the rate so determined shall, at such intervals as the Secretary finds necessary to effectuate the declared policy, be adjusted by him to conform to such requirements.

Not only is the rate to be fixed by him but when it is laid, and when it will stop, is fixed by him.

The processing tax shall terminate at the end of the marketing year current at the time the Secretary proclaims that rental or benefit payments are to be discontinued with respect to such commodity.

When will that stop?—

The marketing year for each commodity shall be ascertained and prescribed by regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

We do not know.

Why was it that the distinguished gentleman who is now President—a candidate at the time—did not specify anything as to what this bill would include nor make the merest suggestion when he spoke in Topeka? The reason is quite obvious—because nobody knew then, and no one knows now, not even the President. We are, therefore, giving it over to one mind. I think I need not say that so far as I know, the present Secretary of Agriculture is a man of very capable mind. It is not that to which I object; but we are giving over to one person the power to fix something when nobody knows what it will be, and then give it the force of law.

(b) The processing tax shall be at such rate as equals the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value of the commodity; except—except that if the Secretary has reason to believe that the tax at such rate will cause such reduction in the quantity of the commodity or products thereof domestically consumed as to result in the accumulation of surplus stocks of the commodity or products thereof or in the depression of the farm price of the commodity, then he shall cause an appropriate investigation to be made and afford due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties.

And he can then discontinue it or modify it.

Here is a tax uncertain as to rate, uncertain as to when it is to begin, uncertain as to when it is to end, all in the power of the Secretary of Agriculture. He lays the tax. He comes to the conclusion that it was a mistake. Then what does he do? He rectifies his mistake by changing it. He modifies it by increasing it, or decreasing it, or taking it off entirely.

How is business going to run on such a basis as that? And how is the farmer in whose name we are legislating going to fare under such a dictation?

The section following this defines the terms of the bill. It states what are the basic articles, naming 7. Then it defines what processing means in the case of wheat, and it defines what processing means in the case of cotton, and so on, including corn. Then there is this singular language, remembering that the bill is all-inclusive under the competing segment of the bill. Now, note this:

In the case of any other commodity, the term "processing" means any manufacturing or other processing involving a change in the form of the commodity or its preparation for market, as defined by regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

What is the definition? It is intended to tell the public what the legal term means in its proper construction; and what is this definition? It defines the item to be what the Secretary of Agriculture will say it is to be. That is a definition that needs defining.

If there is anything that is essential in a law, it is clarity, clearness, and certainty, so that its meaning may be known. There can be neither in the mysticism of a single mind, the dictator of the production of 30,000,000 people distributed to 120,000,000 citizens. There is no meaning to be given here, because it is not yet defined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Yesterday the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] discussed in a forceful and eloquent speech the bureau here at Washington. I do not intend to take any additional time on that subject.

In the admirable address that was delivered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on last Friday, as I remember, I raised the question of the meaning of subsection (c) of section 10. I do not think I ought to be at all surprised at the stretch of power that is in this subsection, in view of the fact that there is no limit to the authority given to the Secretary of Agriculture. This bill, in fact, wholly substitutes the power of the Secretary of Agriculture for the power of Congress:

(c) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, with the approval of the President, to make such regulations with the force and effect of law as may be necessary to carry out the powers vested in him by this title. Any violation of any regulation shall be subject to such penalty, not in excess of $100, as may be provided therein.

Mr. President, we even give to the Secretary of Agriculture the power of criminal procedure. We give to him the power to make regulations; and those regulations, by the language of the bill, are to have the force and effect of law, and any person violating those regulations is to suffer a penalty of $100.

If it is conceivable that we want to do that sort of thing, I cannot understand it.

Mr. President, it is very obvious that the writers of this bill—which smells of the cloister and has the scintillations of the theorist—knew that it was totally unworkable; and in order to avoid clogging the channel of its operation they have, in subsection (e), escaped the auditing of their accounts by exemption from the examination of the Comptroller General.

Mr. President, if this bill were not one dealing with agriculture, a regulation like that never could get through either the House or the Senate. There is no other industry that ever could get such an exemption as that.

The theory of audit is that the spender of the money must not be permitted to audit his own accounts. The triumph of this century was when Congress took over the authority of auditing accounts of the executive department which is the spending department of this Government. Congress is the authorizing department of the Government; and the Congress that authorizes the expenditure is the power that must be permitted to audit the accounts of the Executive, who is the expending officer of the Government.

We have a bureau known as the "General Accounting Office." It is headed by one who is subject to removal only by impeachment. He cannot be removed by the Executive. The Executive has no control over him. Why? He is the spokesman of Congress, the authorizing power to examine the accounts of the Executive, the spending power. In the days of General Grant, when he wanted the Comptroller of the Treasury to do a certain thing, and he said he could not, the President is alleged to have said, "Well, I cannot make you do it, but I can get another Comptroller."

Here is the case where Congress, in a bill signed by the President, reformed the auditing of the accounts of the Executive, and took from the Executive Department the right to audit its own accounts, and created a body representing Congress to audit the accounts of the spending department, and created it in such a way that no one can remove it except Congress.

As the Presiding Officer and every Senator knows, no payment can be made if there is any doubt about it until the Comptroller General approves it as in accordance with law. We authorized last session appropriations of $3,918,000 for the maintaining of the General Accounting Office. It is there, ready to work. Every other department of the Government must be submissive to that authority. A provision is written into this measure that none of these accounts are to be audited by the Comptroller General. I will read it, found on the bottom of page 14, subsection (e).

The action of any officer, employee, or agent in determining the amount of and in making any rental or benefit payment shall not be subject to review by any officer of the Government other than the Secretary of Agriculture or Secretary of the Treasury.

That is a complete reversal of the reform we have written, that no department can audit its own accounts, that all accounts must be audited by the auditing department of the Government, the General Accounting Office, headed by the Comptroller General, who cannot be removed except by impeachment.

Why was that written in there? Because, in the first place, we are giving the power to the Secretary of the Treasury to make law, and the Comptroller General will certainly say, "That is not law, and there will be no payment under it." We are going to get around that by not allowing him to have anything to do with it. That is a confession that the bill is unworkable, and we should never submit to such a thing as that. That section ought to go out.

When we were discussing the bill, I raised the question as to why we should give to the Secretary of Agriculture the powers written in sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Those sections in that act authorize investigations, and they can compel witnesses to attend and testify, and they would be subjected to punishment in the way of very substantial fines if they disobeyed.

Here is the Federal Trade Commission, with all the machinery set up. The proponents of this bill do not want the Secretary of Agriculture to be disturbed by any independent commission whose purpose is to do the thing they want the Secretary of Agriculture to do. I assert that with the full knowledge that it will not be contested. If it were not that orders have come down from above to pass this bill as it is written, it could not get half a dozen votes here. My friend the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] would not vote for a thing like this.

Mr. President, I have referred to commodities. While they are only referred to as seven, the competing angle of the bill makes it all-inclusive, governing everything. I spoke a moment ago about the revolutionary change in the taxing power. Here is the appropriation power. I read section 12, page 16:

The proceeds derived from taxes—

Where do taxes go? They must go to the Treasury. How do they come out of the Treasury? They cannot come out except by action of Congress in the regular way. The committee reporting this bill is not an appropriation committee, it is a legislative committee, and this provision for that reason alone is subject to a point of order.

The proceeds derived from taxes imposed under this title, or so much thereof as may be necessary—

are hereby appropriated.

Mr. President, section 12, on page 6, makes an appropriation of funds from the Treasury which have not yet been collected.

The very distinguished Senator now presiding [Mr. CLARK in the chair], who served with so much grace and dignity in the House of Representatives as Parliamentarian when his most distinguished father was Speaker, during all the time I was a Member of the House—and no one is more familiar with the rules than he—knows that not a dollar can come out of the Treasury except through an appropriation by Congress. Here is a bill which provides for the collection of taxes and, in the same measure, does not authorize the appropriation but actually makes the appropriation before the taxes are collected. If ever there was before proposed such a revolutionary procedure in legislation, I have not known anything about it.

I now read subdivision (b):

The Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury shall jointly estimate from time to time the amounts currently required for such payments and expenses, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall advance, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Secretary of Agriculture the amounts so estimated.

That is a guess. It is left, not with the Secretary of Agriculture alone, but with him in conjunction with the Secretary of the Treasury, to estimate what the needs will be, and then the Secretary of the Treasury is required to advance out of the Treasury funds to take care of these expenses. Suppose the expenses are beyond the income, as they will be. That does not matter.

Mr. President, the tax is collected. I am talking about the general matter of income taxes. Our collectors collect taxes, and they make some erroneous collections. There have been spurious estimates, and taxes have been illegally collected, and the taxpayer may pay under protest and come to Washington and ask for a refund. The Treasury reviews the case, it goes through a long rigmarole, through various stages, and finally it may be heard before the Board of Tax Appeals and decided that the taxes should be refunded.

Can the taxpayer whose tax has been illegally collected, and so decided by proper authorities, get his money by going to the Secretary of the Treasury and asking him for what the Treasury says is due him? He cannot. He has to present his case before the proper officers, and they have to present the matter to Congress, and not a dollar goes out of the Treasury for a refund except as we authorize it and make the appropriation here. What does this bill do? I read subsection (c):

(c) The Secretary of Agriculture shall transfer to the Treasury Department and is authorized to transfer to other agencies, out of funds available under this title, such sums as are required to pay administrative expenses incurred and refunds made by such department or agencies.

A refund is to be paid by the Secretary of Agriculture with no authorization, either by this body or anyone else but himself. Yet a taxpayer whose taxes have been illegally collected, which fact has been so adjudicated, could not get a dollar until Congress made the appropriation. There is not a fundamental principle of taxation or appropriation upon which we have been operating which this bill does not violate.

Originally the bill provided that the law should terminate in two years. That was changed so as to provide that it should terminate when the President terminated it.

Mr. President, I especially want to call attention to section 15, subdivision (a). If this section is as I understand it, I do not think the Senate wants to pass it. It provides:

SEC. 15. (a) If the Secretary of Agriculture finds, upon investigation at any time and after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties, that any class of products of any commodity is of such low value compared with the quantity of the commodity used for their manufacture that the imposition of the processing tax would prevent in whole or in large part the use of the commodity in the manufacture of such products and thereby substantially reduce consumption and increase the surplus of the commodity, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall abate or refund any processing tax assessed or paid after the date of such certification with respect to such amount of the commodity as is used in the manufacture of such products.

That, I think, is one of the most serious features in this bill. Let us take wheat as the commodity. The product of wheat is flour. A tax has been placed upon wheat, we will say, and the tax has been so burdensome that consumption has fallen and the price is broken.

We will say we are using potatoes as a competing article, and instead of buying the flour people buy potatoes, or something else to take the place of flour. The Secretary of Agriculture finds that that is being done. Therefore, finding that the operation of the law is resulting in the piling up of a surplus, depressing the price of both the commodity and the product, to relieve that situation, the Secretary of Agriculture will certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall abate or refund any processing tax.

How would that operate? The miller buys a thousand bushels of wheat. He has to pay the man who sold him the wheat the current price, and, in the form of a tax, the difference between the current price and the fair exchange price. This difference he gives in the form of a certificate. The miller has paid the farmer for this amount of wheat. He is paid for it in money and in a certificate. The farmer takes the certificate and will cash it at the bank if he can find a bank that will take it, which is cashed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The farmer has his money from the miller and banker. The Secretary of Agriculture finds that in that process the price was so broken that he would have to discontinue it, and therefore the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to refund the tax. To whom? To the miller, I suppose. Well, the Secretary of the Treasury owes that amount to the man who has the scrip, and if he presents it he is paid. So, if the Secretary is authorized to refund it, that much is a total loss to the Treasury, because it is paid to the farmer for his scrip and refunded to the miller.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. That is upon the theory that a change in the price of wheat may become necessary on account of the price of bread.

Mr. FESS. That does not answer the suggestion.

Mr. NORBECK. Can the Senator tell me of a single instance where the price of bread has changed on account of the price of wheat?

Mr. FESS. Examination will show that the price of bread changes when the price of wheat goes up, but it is not likely to change when the price of wheat goes down.

Mr. NORBECK. In other words, when there is from half a cent to 1 cent of wheat in a loaf of bread a condition will be created that will call for an adjustment.

Mr. FESS. The Senator knows that industry very quickly increases the price of its products if the raw commodity used by the industry is increased in price.

Mr. NORBECK. Yes; but the middleman may have to absorb a little.

Mr. FESS. And industry will not decrease the price when the price of the raw commodity goes down.

Mr. NORBECK. I admit that they "charge all that the traffic will bear"; the Senator and I absolutely agree on that. Therefore, I contend that they cannot charge any more and that the middleman has got to absorb a little of the increase. A 10-cent loaf of bread with a half a cent's worth of wheat in it is the condition we have.

Mr. FESS. Yes; but I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that does not answer the question at all.

Mr. NORBECK. No; but the Senator is starting on the presumption that a certain thing will happen, and he uses wheat as an example. I contend that it cannot happen in the case of wheat and bread.

Mr. FESS. Why put it in here, then?

Mr. NORBECK. I did not write the bill.

Mr. FESS. Why put this provision in? I am honest in my contention.

Mr. NORBECK. No one questions the Senator's honesty at all; I am merely questioning his logic.

Mr. FESS. My logic is certainly as strong as my honesty is clear.

Mr. NORBECK. I do not think so.

Mr. FESS. Yes, it is. If it is not, I want the Senator from South Dakota to explain this paragraph. Let me read it again.

Mr. NORBECK. I am not going to explain any paragraph to the Senator. I did not write the bill. There can be many explanations. I have heard here forecast a good many things that might happen. I beg pardon of the Senator and I will not further take his time.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is not interfering with me at all. The Senator from South Dakota is one Member of this body who knows about this very question probably better than anyone else, and it is a subject that I want him to explain to me. I will read it again:

SEC. 15. (a) If the Secretary of Agriculture finds, upon investigation at any time and after due notice and opportunity for hearing to interested parties, that any class of products of any commodity—is of such low value compared with the quantity of the commodity used for their manufacture that the imposition of the processing tax would prevent in whole or in large part the use of the commodity in the manufacture of such products and thereby substantially reduce consumption and increase the surplus of the commodity, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall abate or refund any processing tax assessed or paid after the date of such certification with respect to such amount of the commodity as is used in the manufacture of such products.

I took flour just as a sample—

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask the Senator whether he made inquiry of the Secretary of Agriculture as to his interpretation of that provision?

Mr. FESS. I have not.

Mr. NORBECK. Nobody else can interpret it.

Mr. FESS. I think probably that is so.

Mr. NORBECK. Why not address the question to those who will interpret it? That could have been done a week or two ago and the Senator would have had an answer.

Mr. FESS. I accept the Senator's chastisement for not consulting with the Secretary of Agriculture. This is what I said: that if there is such a refund it is paying out of the Treasury the amount to the miller that the Treasury has paid to the farmer, and that much is lost to the Treasury and does nobody any good. I hold that that is incontrovertible, and it seems to me that that feature of the bill ought to be eliminated.

There are a great many other provisions in the bill along the same line. I do not want to take any more time, however, for the reason that it has been generally understood that I could not give my consent to the enormous delegation of power; but I do not want anyone to think that because of my objection I would obstruct the bill, because I do not mean to do so. I wanted to discuss the bill itself. I have only partially done so. I had anticipated going through the entire bill. However, I will not further comment on individual sections. There are some other features as to the theory of the bill, which do not go to the mechanics of it, to which I want to give attention. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina if he knows Mr. William D. Anderson, of Macon, Ga.?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, Mr. President; I know him.

Mr. FESS. I do not want to ask any question that might seem improper, but I am wondering whether Mr. Anderson might be regarded merely as a propagandist or whether what he might say to an individual Senator could be taken at 100 percent?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Anderson's character and ability are certainly as fine as those of any man I know in that section or in any other part of the country.

Mr. FESS. Very well, Mr. President; I have a communication from Mr. Anderson in regard to this bill which is actually the strongest presentation I have yet seen by way of controverting the feasibility of adopting legislation of this character. It is so strong that I think it ought to go in the RECORD, but I do not know that I shall ask that it go in the RECORD because it is so long. Mr. Anderson, in pointing out his objection to the bill, states that he objects to it on three grounds. He declares the first ground to be that it would be a boomerang and would do the farmer more harm than good, and then he sets out arguments which I think are unanswerable and conclusive. Mr. Anderson says:

> The bill will not restore prosperity to agriculture. It fails to provide a remedy for the vital difficulty which confronts the cotton farmer today.

He says it does not deal with the two items essential—first to increase consumption, and if that fails, then to limit production. He continues:

> If we are to help the cotton farmer by legislation, then such legislation must have for its purpose a broadening of the market for cotton and cotton goods. Our objection to this bill is that its terms will tend to curtail the consumption of cotton and of cotton goods.

Further, he says—

> The production of cotton must be reduced until the world surplus is of such moderate proportions that the price of cotton will not be depressed by it. His (the cotton farmer's) production must be intelligently adjusted to the consumptive needs of the world. In addition to this, the market for his cotton must be stimulated by increasing the consumption of cotton for both domestic and industrial use.

These statements of Mr. Anderson are all fundamental; they are really elemental. Then he raises the question as to just how much the price of cotton goods will be increased. I want the Senators to note this statement. He says that if the tax be applied only to the domestically consumed portion of the crop, then it will raise the price of cotton 7 cents per pound, but if it be applied to both domestic and export it will raise it 17 cents. Of course, under this bill it would apply only to the cotton consumed domestically. Mr. Anderson further says:

> Either figure imposes a frightful sales tax on the consumption of cotton goods and will inevitably curtail their consumption. Those of us in daily contact with the very problem of distributing textiles are scarred with the battles we fight with the buying public over the price of goods where one sixteenth and one eighth of a cent per yard is involved in the discussion.

Where the price is increased by only one sixteenth of a cent a yard.

> There will be set forth in a later paragraph figures showing that textile products in common use must be advanced from 15 to 70 percent if a processing tax of approximately 7 cents per pound is to be assessed on cotton.

Then, in asking what effect that would have upon the trade, he makes the statement:

> It can be safely predicted that the passage of this bill will be a severe boomerang for the farmer and one of the severest blows that has yet been dealt him in the effort to artificially advance the price of his products through legislation that contravenes the most elemental and fundamental laws of business.

The second objection is as to the effect the bill would have upon the textile industry; and since the chairman of the committee, who knows personally Mr. Anderson, has vouched for his integrity and his ability, I want Senators to note these figures:

> On the assumption that the processing tax on cotton will be approximately 7 cents per pound, the Cotton Textile Institute has made careful calculations which indicate that standard print cloth, the material out of which the dresses worn by those in moderate circumstances are made, will be increased in price from 42 to 44 percent, depending on the construction.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. What is the weight of the cotton in a cotton dress or a cotton shirt?

Mr. FESS. I think the weight is very light, but I do not know what it is.

Mr. NORBECK. It is about a half a pound, is it not? So how could the tax make the finished product so much more expensive.

Mr. FESS. I am quoting what is said by Mr. Anderson, who is an expert in cotton matters.

Mr. NORBECK. What he says is an argument rather than a statement, is it not?

Mr. FESS. It is a statement, and the argument will have whatever effect the statement will justify.

> Carded broadcloth, out of which medium-priced shirts and underwear are made, will be increased 40 percent.

Dress goods are light in weight, while broadcloth is not light in weight.

> Narrow sheeting—

And such sheeting is not light in weight.

> Narrow sheeting, which is an article of common household use, will be increased from 55 to 62 percent, depending on the construction. Chambray, out of which work shirts are made, will be increased from 37 to 39 percent, depending on the construction. Denims, out of which workmen's overalls and work clothing are made, will be increased 46.6 percent. Wide sheeting, used in the manufacture of bed sheets, will be increased 36 percent. Carded yarns, of the type used in the manufacture of the ordinary grades of knit underwear and of workingmen's socks, will be increased approximately 70 percent. The increases on the lighter-weight and sheerer fabrics used in the more expensive garments take a smaller increase than do the goods more largely consumed.

It is that phase that was the basis of my question to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] as to the mental integrity of the man who had written this statement. I know that when we put on a tax of so much it is said that it is a tax of 100 percent in the form of a sales tax. That itself does not have the effect on me that the actual figure of increase to the consumer has. In other words, the Senator from South Dakota properly asks the question, If we decrease the price of wheat, how much effect will that have on bread? When we increase the price of wheat we say it is so many percent, and yet it will not increase the price of bread. I want every man to know that if we put on this percentage of increase in the form of a tax on cotton it will have a certain effect on the actual price of the finished product. I did not want it in a percentage of tax. I wanted to know how it would be reflected on the consumer, and this is his statement giving the various articles of the trade. There can be no question about the accurate knowledge of this dealer.

Mr. President, I want the attention of my colleagues in connection with another phase of the measure. It is a very dangerous thing for Congress to enter into the realm of price fixing. I do not mean merely because it is economically bad, as everybody admits it is; but I want Senators to know what effect it has upon the consuming public. It is a very serious thing for Congress by its decree to say that the consumer must pay more for his food and clothing than he is now paying. It is true that we might feel justified in saying that he is paying too much and putting a limit on it as we did in the case of the railroads. We gave the power of regulating railroad rates to a Government agency, not to increase the rates but to save the public from an increase, and forbidding an increase.

The purpose of railroad rate regulation in behalf of the public was on the theory of having lower rates and still allowing an adequate return to the railroads. That was the purpose of the law. But here it is proposed, in the interest of the public, not to reduce the consumers' costs but to increase those costs, and it is by the Government itself that it is being done. We are going to have a repercussion from this measure. Especially will we have it when the unemployed feel irked at having to pay more for clothing and food because of the voluntary act of Congress in order to assist one particular section of our population.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on April 7 made as strong a presentation of the pending bill as I think anybody could. He is always effective and powerful in his presentation of any subject. At page 1395 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 7 he explained why we use 1909 to 1914 as the base period. These are the words of the Senator from Arkansas:

> The base period selected by this measure, 1909–14, has not been selected by chance. The exception made for tobacco is a special case, and I shall mention it in a moment.
> Indeed, it has already been discussed; questions have been asked and answered. It so happens that during that pre-war period the prices of the things the farmer sold and the prices of the things he bought were in the most satisfactory exchange relationship that had been achieved up to that time. So far as price relationships were concerned, the buying power of both farmer and city worker was functioning smoothly and effectively. We seemed to have reached the point in this period when both agriculture and industry were prospering on even terms.

That is a clear statement of why that period was accepted. But that was a period of high prices and I am wondering whether the Senator from Arkansas recalls what the Democratic platform of 1912, which fell within that period, said? I will read it. This is the platform adopted at the convention of 1912 held in Baltimore, which named the distinguished president of Princeton, later Governor of New Jersey, who made a very distinguished President:

> The high cost of living is a serious problem in every American home. The Republican Party, in its platform, attempts to escape from responsibility for present conditions by denying that they are due to a protective tariff. We take issue with them on this subject, and charge that excessive prices result in a large measure from the high tariff laws enacted and maintained by the Republican Party and from trusts and commercial conspiracies fostered and encouraged by such laws, and we assert that no substantial relief can be secured for the people without import duties on the necessaries of life are materially reduced and these criminal conspiracies broken up.

That was the plank on the high cost of living adopted in July 1912, within the period which the Senator from Arkansas states:

> So far as price relationships were concerned, the buying power of both farmer and city worker was functioning smoothly and effectively. We seemed to have reached the point in this period when both agriculture and industry were prospering on even terms.

Mr. President, I do not read that plank because of what might be charged as an inconsistency of that plank with this proposal. That is not the purpose. I read the plank to call attention to the question of cost of living becoming a political issue, as in the past, on the basis of the charge and the complaint that the cost of living was too high and due to Republican policy. Here it is due to actual legislation under the leadership of that party. If Congress performed the function by its fiat, saying the price of an article of consumption shall be so-and-so, then the consumer has a right to look to Congress as to protection against the amount of increased cost he is going to suffer in the purchase of any article of necessity. We are treading a dubious path when we enter the field of price fixing, not only economic but political. I want to avoid the necessity for any citizen of our country to feel it his right and privilege to look to Washington for relief from conditions for which the Government is not responsible and asking Congress to do for him something that it is not our business whatever to do. I very much dislike to see the Government launching into the realm of price fixing. A part of the American public will demand higher prices; another, a larger part, will charge to the Congress that we are robbing them by making the price too high. The price may not be too high, but the mere fact that we are responsible for the cost, if such proposal as this is law, makes us more or less responsive to the charge of the American people. It seems to me that is worthy of our careful consideration, especially on behalf of the producer of food who will be outvoted 6 to 1 if a contest is made between him and the consumer.

Mr. President, I regret that the problem confronting us seems to appeal to this body as a political question. We have here written a bill wherein at every place the term "economic law" should appear there has been stricken out any such term and inserted in lieu thereof "political appointment." Instead of economic laws determining, a political appointee is to determine. I wonder what would be the meditations of a man like Thomas Jefferson, the greatest representative of the liberty of the individual citizen in government that ever lived, the finest exponent of local self-government of any person in this or any other country, so far as I know, the founder of a philosophy that had such tremendous drawing power that in these many years it has controlled the Government so often and in its name at least is now in control of the Government. Yet Thomas Jefferson, the author of the classic expression "That government is best which governs least", must see the people who bear his name now foisting upon the country a policy under which the Government at Washington touches with its official dictation every individual self-respecting farmer in America. What must be the reflections of the founder of that theory of politics? Talk about Hamilton, the representative of power! He never dreamed of anything like this. In fact, no one has ever dreamed of anything like this. I cannot go along with the admitted experiment. After voting for the mass of legislation of farm relief the past 20 years, with the present results to agriculture, I cannot take this leap into sovietism.

Mr. President, this morning's Baltimore Sun contains a very interesting editorial on this subject. I do not want to take the time to read it, but I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Friday, Apr. 14, 1933]

FARM-RELIEF MYSTICISM

If the administration's farm relief bill is passed, the Secretary of Agriculture will be king of agriculture and a large part of industry as well, probably with greater powers at his command than any appointed official in the peace-time history of the Nation. Then what difference does it make whether or not he has the power, conferred upon him yesterday by the Senate over his protest, to order farmers to be paid the cost of production for their products? If we are going in for kings of agriculture, why quibble about that?

Perhaps the principal reason is that the inclusion of this particular provision would add to Secretary Wallace's obligations as a czar those of a seer and mystic. As the bill is rigged up at present, the powers are conferred upon the Secretary to attain certain fairly specific, if arbitrary, objectives—the restoration of certain price parities between agricultural and nonagricultural products. But by adding to his powers that of ordering farmers paid the cost of production for their wares, the Senate would call upon the Secretary to master the unknown. There is no agreement on the nature of "cost of production" as an economic concept. Down through the ages economists have been fighting about it indecisively. And could that fight be settled, there would remain the terrific job of applying the concepts to millions of farms, with the ultimate goal being the attainment of certain relatively meaningless averages.

Since the Senate would merely authorize and not direct the Secretary of Agriculture to order farmers paid cost of production for their products, it may be argued that the Senate action makes no difference because Mr. Wallace has said he does not want the power. In being made a king, however, Mr. Wallace probably realizes that he will not only be under popular pressure to live up to the legends about kings, but a prey to his own impulses to move from mere temporal power to triumphs in the realm of metaphysics. Successful application of the cost-of-production formula would call for such a triumph. He is wise to try to avoid the obligation, and the House would do well to see that it is not forced upon him.

It is bad enough to be faced by a farm-relief program which involves dangerous movement along "an untrod path" through worldly mazes. We should be saved the necessity of having our Secretary of Agriculture become a practicing mystic.

During the delivery of Mr. FESS' speech——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so that I may send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill in order that it may be printed for consideration at a future time?

Mr. FESS. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. GLASS. I send the amendment to the desk, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ERICKSON in the chair). The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not care to have it read.

Mr. FESS. I am glad to yield to any request ever made by the Senator from Virginia.

After the conclusion of Mr. FESS' speech,

Mr. CAPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me to put in the RECORD something to which my attention has been called by the remarks of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Ohio has referred to the increased cost to the consumer. I do not find myself in disagreement with the Senator from Ohio in the fundamental principles involved. I think the present legislation is excusable only on account of the terrible conditions in which we find ourselves. It seems reasonable to infer that if we increase the price of wheat and other farm products to the producer, we will increase the price to the consumer; and yet statistics show that that does not always occur.

Nobody can tell now how much the price of a loaf of bread or a package of cigarettes will be increased if this bill goes into effect. Many people think it will not be increased at all.

As bearing on the subject, I desire to quote some figures given before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry by Mr. Francis J. Clair, president of the National League for Economic Stabilization, Chicago, Ill. It appears on page 204 of the hearings.

He proposed, in the plan that he was presenting, to fix the price definitely, although he said it would be changed from year to year; but under present conditions he wanted to fix the price of wheat at $1.25 a bushel, the price of corn at 87 cents a bushel, the price of cotton at 18 cents a pound, the price of wool at 32 cents a pound, and the price of oats at 42 cents a bushel. Starting from those figures, Mr. Clair made some computations.

He said that he was out in Iowa, at the town of Lamar. He went to the elevator. He saw a farmer bring in a load of corn and sell it to the elevator man for 4 cents a bushel. That is what the producer got when he delivered it to the nearest railroad market from his farm.

The same day that he saw that, Mr. Clair says, he went to a restaurant in Lamar. He bought a package of Post Toasties, made of corn, probably produced right in that vicinity, and he paid 10 cents for it. It weighed one half ounce. It contained one half ounce of corn. So he figured out that that made $3.20 a pound, or $192 a bushel, that the consumer was paying for corn.

He went on to say that he came to Washington. The day before he testified he bought a package of Puffed Wheat. It weighed one half ounce. He paid 10 cents for it in a popular restaurant here in the Capital City. He figured out that that meant $300 a bushel that he, the final consumer, paid for wheat which the farmer in Kansas and Nebraska is selling now for 24 or 25 cents a bushel, and in some places for less.

Then he referred to Uneeda Biscuit, a product of wheat. Uneeda Biscuit sold for 5 cents a package when wheat was selling for $3.65 a bushel. It is selling for 5 cents a package today.

Let me read something that Mr. Clair says happened in Chicago at a bakers' convention, where he was in attendance just 6 weeks ago. He saw a new device offered to the bakers to slice bread before it was furnished to the housewife.

After some 2 hours spent with the manufacturer of that machine—

Mr. Clair says—

I was able to calculate that this one little new device, a machine to cut bread, cost more per loaf to slice it than the farmer got for the raw material entering the breadstuff. What is true of the Uneeda Biscuit is true of a suit of clothes.

He figured out, on this basis that I have told you about, with the price of wool at 42 cents a pound, how much there is in a suit of clothes and what it costs.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not the floor. I am speaking by the courtesy of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAPPER. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator any figures as to the increase of price of the product when the commodity price increases? The Senator's figures are as to a decrease.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I do not think the price of a product is decreased by decreasing the price of the commodity.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may be right about that, but it ought to be. If it is a fair rule, it ought to work both ways. If the consumer is to be charged the same price for a loaf of bread or a package of Uneeda Biscuit when the farmer gets $3.65 a bushel as when he is getting 25 cents a bushel, the thing ought to work the other way also, and if it is fair it will.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator misinterpreted my question.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably.

Mr. FESS. The point I made was that when the price of the commodity is increased the baker will almost certainly increase the price of bread; but when the price of the commodity is decreased he does not decrease the price of bread. I think that is the practice.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will admit that it ought to be done, however.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, I am trying to illustrate that nobody can tell just what the effect on the consumer is going to be when the price of the product produced by the original producer is changed, either up or down. We do know, however, from the statistics, that there is no mathematical rule by which that can be determined. I concede that the price of the finished article ought to go up and down, just as the price of the raw product goes up and down, but it does not operate that way; and many believe—and I think they are partially right—that that would be the case here.

I am not one who is claiming that an increase in the price of the raw commodity will not increase the price to the consumer. I do not want to be understood as taking that position. I think it will be justified, however, because we start with the basis that the producer will not and cannot continue to produce unless he gets at least the cost of production.

I thank the Senator from Kansas for yielding to me.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate the action of the Legislature of the State of Kansas with respect to the pending legislation. It is in the form of a concurrent resolution adopted unanimously by a legislature which is especially well qualified to voice the wishes of the farmers of Kansas and is well qualified also to speak for the agriculture of the West.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas Kansas is largely an agricultural State and largely dependent on that industry; and

Whereas prices of agricultural products, both crops and livestock, are now, and have long been, so low that the farmers are unable to pay taxes, interest, and upkeep and to secure a living return for their capital and labor; and

Whereas many farmers already have been dispossessed of their homes and thousands more are threatened with the loss of the accumulations of a life of toil; and

Whereas the business of our cities has been heavily curtailed by the plight of agriculture and thousands of our laboring men have been thrown out of employment: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States is urged to speedily enact into law the measures for farm relief as now proposed by President Roosevelt in special message of March 16, 1933, in order that agriculture and industry may be rehabilitated and labor given employment; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States and to the Senate and to the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Members of the Kansas delegation therein.

Then I have a telegram which comes from the farm organizations of the State of Kansas. Every farm organization with a State-wide membership joins in this appeal to the Congress to enact this legislation.

The telegram, dated April 7, addressed to myself, says:

The committee of Kansas farm organizations— .

And let me say that they have a membership of nearly a quarter of a million—consisting of State Farmers' Union, the Grange, the Farm Bureau, the Kansas Wheat Marketing Association, the Farmers' Union Jobbing Association, Cooperative Commission Co., Cooperative Grain Dealers, Equity Union, Kaw Valley Potato Growers' Association, and Washington County Creamery Association, assembled in annual meeting, unanimously endorses the emergency farm-relief measure as passed by the House and as it now stands in Senate, and urges its speedy enactment. We collectively and individually offer our support in its administration in any way in which we may be of service.

RALPH SNYDER, President.
W. O. SAND, Secretary.

Mr. President I am going to vote for the pending emergency farm-relief measure because I believe it is a step in the right direction. I hope it is a long step in the right direction. I realize fully that it proposes to give unusual, in some respects almost unlimited, powers to the executive branch of the Government. I realize that to a great extent the success or failure of the measure depends upon the wisdom, the patriotism, and the common sense with which it is administered.

No one is more fully aware than I of the fact that no one piece of legislation—nor, in fact, any amount of legislation alone—can solve all the problems of agriculture.

Everyone sympathizes with those simple souls who demand a "simple and easily understood" bill for the relief of agriculture. But the fact is that the relation of agriculture to industry in a complex and highly developed civilization is a very complicated relationship.

There is no simple solution to such a complicated problem, nor is there any guaranteed solution. If there were a simple solution, guaranteed to work, we would have little trouble in reaching an agreement to adopt that solution and use it.

I am perfectly aware of the fact that this measure, especially in its implications and possibilities, is a complex piece of legislation. Also, I am aware that it is highly experimental and possibly may not work.

Now that does not mean that I am supporting the measure because it is complicated, because it is experimental, because it may not work. It simply means that I am voting for it with a full recognition of these objections to the measure. I favor the lower rates of interest for refinanced farm mortgages, as provided in the Frazier bill, but otherwise the measure has my approval.

As a matter of fact, I have hopes that the measure is flexible enough to make it possible for the Secretary of Agriculture—perhaps I should say the President of the United States, because it really is to the President that we are granting the broad powers conveyed in this measure—I have hopes that the act's flexibility will make it possible for the President to succeed in this experiment of national planning for the country's basic industry of agriculture.

In connection with the broad powers granted the Chief Executive and the Secretary of Agriculture in this measure, I want to say something else.

Even if I were not so vitally interested in relief for agriculture, even if I had less faith in this measure than I have, I probably would feel impelled to support the measure.

In the first place, President Roosevelt has asked for its enactment as a part of his national emergency program. He says this measure is a necessary part of that program. Under present conditions, with this Nation in what I believe is the most critical period in its history, at least since the Civil War, I have been supporting the President's other emergency measures—excepting the one which declares 3.2-percent beer to be nonintoxicating, and I reserved my right to oppose that from the beginning. I intend to continue giving him my support as long as he proposes constructive measures which are plainly intended and planned and worked out in the public interest.

In the second place, almost ever since I have been in the Senate, Congress has been trying earnestly to find a solution of this farm problem. We have tried earnestly, conscientiously, patriotically; but there were too many of us with varying ideas to agree upon what should be done. Now President Roosevelt has asked for the responsibility of solving the problem. He says give him the power and he will take that responsibility. At least we will get action in place of inaction and in my judgment we are more likely to get results from action than from continued inaction, and, in a way, this may be the most practical program yet suggested in Congress for dealing with the ills of agriculture.

For one thing, this measure deals with realities; this measure faces facts; it gets down to brass tacks, so to speak. It is based upon a realization of actualities, actualities which until now only the farm organizations, the farm leaders, some economists, and a few who have been known as "the farm bloc" in the Congress for the last 10 or 12 years have known to be the facts.

The pending measure, this program for restoring farm prices and farm purchasing power, lays down the flat proposition that to restore agriculture, to bring the farmer back into the buying market, to make farming pay, it is necessary to bring about a parity in exchange of products between agriculture and industry. And that proposition goes to the heart of the problem of civilization.

It probably is safe to say that man—and mankind—needs just about 7 things to assure his material well-being. His other wants and desires and comforts and progress rest upon these basic needs. They are:

Food; shelter; clothing; fuel and transportation, including communications; a medium of exchange; and reasonable security for life and property.

It has been more or less accepted in our civilization that if Government furnishes a reasonable security for life and property and controls the medium of exchange and transportation, then individuals can be trusted to provide and exchange among themselves the necessary food, shelter, clothing, and fuel, and in the process obtain each his fair share of the comforts and luxuries of life. But somewhere along the line we have fallen down. Today we have a Nation of 120 million persons, with plenty of food, enough shelter, plenty of clothing, plenty of fuel, plenty of transportation—plenty of these five fundamental requirements.

With plentiful supplies of food, however, we have bread lines; with sufficient shelter, we have millions of homeless; there is plenty of clothing, but millions only partly clothed.

With immense resources of fuel, during the winter many suffer from cold.

And with all our wonderful systems of transportation—by rail, by highways, by water, by air—necessities are not being moved to where they are needed.

Why?

There are many suggested answers to that question. I am not going to try to give an answer and say it is the answer. But I will suggest a few points that I think have an important bearing on the subject.

In the first place, Government has fallen down on its job of furnishing and regulating an adequate medium of exchange. Our monetary and financial system is grievously faulty.

In the second place, Government is not furnishing the reasonable security to life and property to which our 120 millions are entitled. Reasonable security of life and property, as I see it, means that those who produce food and shelter and fuel and clothing, and the many services that go with these, are entitled to exchange their products for other commodities and services on a fair basis of exchange. In other words, they are entitled to parity of exchange values in the exchange of their commodities and services.

One of the facts this measure takes into account is that over a period of time the group of our people who, year after year, are on the short end of the exchange of the things they produce for the things they have to get from others in the end is going to go broke. When it does, it no longer affords a market for the products of other groups.

For this reason it is in the long-time interest of all groups of the community that each group is enabled to trade its products or services for other products and services on a fairly even basis. From the national viewpoint this has always seemed to me to be particularly true of agriculture. It embraces a large part of our population. It furnishes the best market for the products of other industry. A stable and prosperous agriculture can and will keep alive the civilization of which it is a part for a long span of time.

From my casual reading of history it seems that every civilization of the past instead of maintaining parity of exchange with agriculture has insisted upon exploiting agriculture. Other industries, centralized in centers of population, organized in large units, have inevitably gained greater bargaining power than the farmers, have exploited the farmers, have ruined the agriculture of that civilization, and thereby ultimately committed suicide.

That is a foolish policy to follow. But it is the policy we have been following in this Nation.

Mr. President, this is not a generalization that I have been making. It is a statement based on the records. There is a bureau in the Department of Agriculture known as the "Bureau of Agricultural Economics." It deals with facts and figures; deals with statistics. I know that statistics are not what might be termed popular. Statistics deal with facts. Facts, even when simple and easily understood, never have enjoyed great popularity, and statistical facts are sometimes complicated. Hence not much attention is paid to them by most of the people. Statistics give most of us a headache and a tired feeling. I am not crazy about statistics myself.

Nevertheless, this Bureau of Agricultural Economics publishes, and has been publishing monthly for years, some facts expressed in figures that tell pretty nearly the complete story of what has happened to agriculture, because agriculture and industry have not exchanged their products on a parity basis.

This B.A.E., as the Bureau is known in farm circles, among other things, keeps track of farm prices. These farm prices afford an index of the basis of exchange of farm products for industrial products. The Bureau has kept track of the prices the farmer receives for his products, the prices he pays for the things he has to buy.

A careful study of the farm price structure resulted in this Bureau taking the 5-year period from 1909 to 1914 as the period in which agriculture and industry in this country were closest to an equitable basis of exchange.

This 5-year period was not Utopia, so far as agriculture was concerned. There was not even then, probably, an absolutely equitable basis of exchange between agriculture and industry. But there was an approximation of that. Both agriculture and industry were doing fairly well. If that basis of exchange had continued through the two decades since, probably we would not have made the millionaires with which this country was cursed in the post-war period. Neither, in my judgment, would we now have had the 14,000,000 unemployed, who seriously threaten the continued life of this Nation of ours.

As I have said, this pre-war parity of purchasing power should not be regarded as Utopia. But we do regard it, we of the Farm Belt and the farm groups, simply as the best level of purchasing power, the best balance between the major producing groups, that has thus far been attained in our industry.

Now let us see what has happened since that time. The B.A.E. started by compiling and analyzing the average prices farmers received for the various farm products during that pre-war period, 1909 to 1914. They combined all these unit prices into one figure and gave that an index value of 100. They figured out in the same way the prices the farmer paid during the same period for the things he had to buy and gave that also an index value of 100. His sales index was 100; his buying index was 100. This was taken as parity, trading products on a basis of dollar for dollar.

That is the pre-war parity which this bill proposes to attempt to restore—gradually, but with as much speed as possible—through giving to the Secretary of Agriculture very broad powers to attempt voluntary control of production, what amounts to an attempted guaranty of cost of production to agriculture, and sufficient control of marketing and distribution to give security of life and property to farmers as well as to the other groups that comprise the national family.

I might say in passing that in my judgment there will have to be monetary reform before this can be accomplished and the parity attained. But this bill does go a step in the right direction. We are not, however, discussing the monetary problem today; we are discussing the farm problem and this bill, which attempts to deal directly with the production and marketing angles of that farm problem. It may not be out of place for me to add that in my judgment we are going to have to come to the stabilized or compensated dollar, as some prefer to call it; in other words, a dollar of constant purchasing power with respect to all commodities.

I stated a few minutes ago that the farm price indices taken as a base by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics gave farm selling prices an index value of 100, farm buying prices an index value of 100. Agriculture and industry are presented in this picture of 1909 to 1914 as trading on a basis of $1 for $1. But that is not the picture today.

The March report, shown in a monthly pamphlet known as the "Agricultural Situation', shows that the farmer's buying index is 104, or 4 percent higher than in the pre-war period. On the other hand, the March report shows that the farmer's selling index was 49, or 51 percent lower than in the pre-war period. In other words, the farmer's unit selling price was 51 cents on the dollar, as compared to the pre-war period. His buying price was 104 cents on the dollar, compared to the same pre-war period. Divide 104 into 49, and we get forty-seven one-hundredths, which represents the farmer's purchasing power today. Stating it another way, instead of exchanging farm products for industrial products on the basis of a dollar for a dollar, the farmer is exchanging on the basis of paying out $1.04 in exchange for 49 cents.

Mr. President, that is the farm problem, exchanging on the basis of paying $1.04 for 49 cents. Is it any wonder that agriculture is bankrupt? Is it any wonder that industry, whose best customer is agriculture, is practically bankrupt also? Is it any wonder that labor, which is the best market for farm products, but whose job depends upon markets for both farm and industrial products, is unemployed to the amount of 14 million?

We have defined the just laws of economics. This bill attempts to restore at least a measure of justice.

Mr. President, I have not presented the entire picture, by a good deal. Other groups of our people, especially in the ranks of labor, can show deplorable conditions, decreased buying power, lowered standards of living, complete demoralization, desperation, and despair.

To give a more complete picture, I am compelled to give some more figures, showing that this defiance of the just economic law has been going on for years.

Agriculture did not just go broke when the market crash came in 1929. Agriculture had been going behind at an average of 15 percent a year for nearly a decade, and this fact was a basic cause of the collapse of industry and finance, the threatened collapse of our entire system of government, and the threatened collapse of our entire social structure.

The farm depression has lasted for at least 12 years. During several of these years it has been acute. All the time the condition has been chronic. The cumulative effect of those years of exchanging products every year at a loss has been to destroy the farmer's purchasing power. When it finally disappeared, the wheels of industry stopped, business was paralyzed, credit evaporated, and the army of unemployed grew to 14 millions of men and women. I am giving these facts and figures because they give the background and form the basis for the farm bill now under consideration.

A few minutes ago I stated that agriculture has been going through this depression for more than 12 years. In 1920, the last year in which agriculture was on a comparatively even basis with industry—the first post-war inflation was then at its height—in 1920, on a wildly inflated post-war basis, farm products that had brought 100 cents were selling for 205 cents. The things the farmer had to buy, however, were costing him 206 cents where they cost him 100 cents in 1909–14. That is, his purchasing power for 1920 was only 99 percent of pre-war. But at that he was on a comparatively even basis with industry, according to the records.

In 1921 the farmer's selling price had dropped to 116 cents per unit, compared to 100 cents pre-war, compared to 206 cents in 1920. At the same time his buying price per unit came down only to 156 cents. Dividing 116 by 156, you have seventy-five one-hundredths, which means that the farmer's purchasing power was reduced to 75 percent. He lost 25 percent on the exchange of his year's labor and investment for the things he had to buy.

This has been referred to by many as the farmer's "75-cent dollar." The term is not exactly accurate, but it does give a true picture of the situation.

Now let us call the roll of the succeeding years, not giving the details of each calculation but merely the results.

In 1922 the purchasing power of farm products was 81 cents on the dollar, compared to pre-war.

In 1923 farm purchasing power was 88 cents.

In 1924 farm purchasing power was 87 cents.

In 1925 farm purchasing power was 92 cents; the percentage against the farmer was only 8 percent, the best he had during all that period.

In 1926 farm purchasing power dropped back to 87 cents.

In 1927 it was 85 cents.

In 1928 it was 90.

In 1929 it was 89.

In 1930 it was 80.

In 1931 it dropped to 63.

Today, as I stated before, it is 47.

Mr. President, those are just figures, but they tell a pitiful, a tragic story. It is a story like that which has preceded the downfall of every civilization, practically, that the world has known; the story of organized industry and finance crushing agriculture and thereby committing suicide. The lesson of history, as I see it, is that unless we can restore the balance between agriculture and industry, and make finance the servant instead of the master of agriculture and industry, this civilization of ours will follow the path of previous civilizations. There are signs of it today all over the world. It is not necessary for me to point them out.

Mr. President, I must place in the record a brief sketch of what these figures mean.

For 10 years the farmer did business at an annual loss of 15 percent. It may be said that is impossible, but I say it is true. How did the farmer do this impossible feat of doing business for 10 years at an average annual loss of 15 percent? He did it by borrowing, by mortgaging his farm, mortgaging his home, mortgaging his cattle, mortgaging his farm machinery, mortgaging his work stock, finally, in the last few years, too frequently by mortgaging his growing crops.

There is the pitiful story of American agriculture. There, unless we do something to correct the situation, is the tragic story of a chapter in the decline and fall of the United States of America. And the fall of the United States of America very likely would be accompanied, perhaps followed, perhaps even preceded, by the collapse of the white man's civilization. These are not idle words, Mr. President. I fear they are words that are only too true.

Mr. President, these are the facts, this is the situation, which justified President Roosevelt in asking the Congress to enact this kind of legislation, giving unheard-of powers to the Secretary of Agriculture to accomplish the purposes set forth in the declaration of policy in the pending bill.

These are the facts and this is the situation which justify me in voting for the pending measure, supporting it, and urging the Senate and the country to support it and to cooperate with the administration in carrying it out. It is a drastic piece of legislation, it is a desperate remedy; but we face a critical situation, brought about largely by a lack of balance between agriculture and industry, plus a defective monetary system and false conceptions of merchandising and finance.

What I mean by that last statement, Mr. President, is simply this: We have developed our distribution system on the theory that merchandising consists in the sale of products. Merchandising is not a sale: it is an exchange. The picture of our foreign trade is bringing that lesson home to us. It is equally true of our domestic trade. Agriculture and industry exchange their products; they must be exchanged on a comparatively even basis if either agriculture or industry, if both agriculture and industry are to survive.

The function of finance is to facilitate the exchange of the products of agriculture and industry, and the services of those engaged in them, which is labor. Money should be regarded as a medium of exchange and a measure of value. Our financial institutions should serve industry and agriculture and labor and be paid a fair return for doing so. But it is an unhealthy situation where finance is engaged in exploiting agriculture and labor and industry. But that phase of the subject is not a part of this farm bill.

Now, in conclusion, I just want to say that I am supporting this measure for the reasons given. If it is wisely and honestly administered, this emergency legislation can be of great service to agriculture and to the country. I am willing to take the chance that it will be wisely and honestly administered. I cannot assume otherwise. Certainly I cannot refuse to support the measure; I cannot sit by and do nothing, in the face of this serious situation.

I have just stated that I cannot do otherwise than assume that the act will be wisely and honestly administered. As a matter of fact, I feel very positive on this point. I know Henry A. Wallace, the Secretary of Agriculture. I have known him for years; knew his father before him, and his grandfather. The Wallace family is a good American family. Henry Wallace has the right ideals. He understands agriculture thoroughly, and is what one might term a real agricultural economist. In the years that I have watched his work I have come to have a great appreciation of his ability, his honesty, his clear thinking along economic lines, and his patriotic conception of his duty to agriculture and to the country. I cannot conceive a man better fitted by inheritance, by aptitude, by training, by study, by ability, by experience, and by ideals to carry out the provisions of this measure than Secretary Wallace. That is another reason why I am not hesitating to intrust this grant of broad powers to the executive department.

It is my hope that the bill will be passed and become law at the earliest possible date. Time is the essence of this legislation as an emergency measure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, following these remarks, an article by Dr. George J. Pierce, botanist and plant physiologist, which appeared some time ago in the Scientific Monthly and which I believe contains some fundamental truths in regard to the relationship of agriculture to the rest of society. I send the article to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Dr. George J. Pierce

As we pass in this western world from the pioneer stages, in which the white man has successfully displaced in the struggle for existence the former occupants of the territory which he has invaded, we approach the conditions prevailing in the older countries of our world. In the oldest countries, in the crowded conditions of Asia, in the less old and less crowded conditions in Europe, we see what is before us unless man learns to effect a new balance in the civilization which he is making. In the civilizations of which ours today is the modern replica, essentially the same balance has always prevailed. Honors, rewards, and power have been given always to the nonproducer, first to the man of might, the militarist, later and today to the man of means, the plutocrat. We have always attempted to do what is contrary to nature. We light the dark hours, we build against gravity; man, a land animal, travels upon and in the sea; and now he attempts to traverse the air. He scorns time and distance as facts, and reduces them to their lowest terms. He ignores his absolute dependence upon food and drink, and crowds together so that neither he nor his neighbors can grow or capture food. By the bounty of nature he survives—destroying the producers of food. He fells the forest for fuel, housing, furniture; he converts the grazing spaces to golf courses or other less amusing uses; he makes the land so valuable that it cannot be planted to food crops; he goes where rain is scanty, and he makes the soil naked so that it washes away. He demands food and drink and, with niggardly hand and unthinking mind, plans what he is pleased to call "farm relief." So far as I can see, the world will never be safe, for democracy or anything else, until man recognizes his absolute dependence, not upon raw materials, mineral resources, coal, oil, or other sources of usable energy, but upon the two things which he cannot make, and one of which it would seem that he never can make in sufficient amount to satisfy even his minimum requirements. The clothes moth makes its own water by its own physiological processes; but who would pattern after the clothes moth even if he could? But no animal makes its own food. In this land of white collars we reward those who can buy them. We do nothing for the men who grow the linen, the cotton, and the starch to make them serviceable and, according to our esthetic standards, fitting. We compensate, more or less uncertainly, the man who grows luxuries on land for which he paid $1,000 an acre. We force the wheat farmer to produce bread at such a price that he must grow it so far from the market that his own wage, being what is left after paying for freight, handling, storage, and the percentages of every handler between himself and the consumer, is so small that a grain broker would consider it negligible. Our food must be grown on the cheapest land if we are to buy it in sufficient quantities. The cheapest land is that most remote and hence least desired for other uses. This fact entails the long and costly haul to market, the repeated handlings by man or machinery, the risks and rents in transit and storage. The milling would cost roughly the same anywhere and at any time. The agricultural problem—and this is the crux of the problem of the struggle for existence—is due to our having emphasized and rewarded everything but the essentials of our existence.

In this funny world of ours, in this amusing country of ours, we have long discussed the device of tariffs. We have invented octroi, customs dues, and finally duties for the protection of infant industries. We have succeeded so remarkably that Fords and safety razors are in the hands of almost all of us. But breakfast should follow the use of the razor, and lunch and dinner must be supplied to the driver of the Ford. Bread, meat, and milk are furnished in return for wages, the very lowest. This has always been the case; but it is necessarily so only because of our misconceived civilization, a civilization the honors and rewards of which are given to the least necessary parts, a broadening civilization the pyramid of which we have built upside down. The reason for the turning of youth from the farm to the town is the miserable, the delayed, the uncertain pay for producing what we cannot get along without. And if, in the struggle for existence, the farmers fail, our civilization will have destroyed itself. We grant, in debate, that agriculture is the foundation of prosperity, and even of existence; but we do nothing to preserve it; we do everything we can to undermine it. We charge our colleges of agriculture with failure to produce farmers. Have our medical schools failed to produce physicians and surgeons, our law schools failed to produce attorneys? We reward their products with the pay they require. Our theological schools have failed. Why? For the same reason that our colleges of agriculture have failed, namely, that the compensation for training and knowledge in these two fields is so inadequate. We still see some young men of brains and character, as well as devotion, entering upon the ministry to souls; and perhaps some young men of brains and character and devotion entering, with inherited capital, upon the ministry to stomachs. But without capital how can one start to produce wheat or corn or meat? If the capital be only the land, and the young man be unwilling to use wife and children as laborers, how far can he go? He must buy seed, implements, and transport for his harvest, and his pay is what?

I see no immediate prospect of our civilization remaking itself. On the contrary, until civilization is forced by hunger, in the struggle for existence, to insure its food supply, the care of individual and public health, the protection of property, and even the aspirations to a higher life, will simply intensify the struggle for existence. We must readjust our rewards; we must compensate the producers of necessities at least as richly as we reward equal ability in other lines.

But to do this implies a social revolution in comparison with which those of the recent and more remote pasts are trifling; in which human nature, always controlled more by sentiment than by reason, will have to overcome the habits of centuries; in which wars, epidemics, famines will have their terrible parts; and before man achieves it or understands it will have taken enormous toll in human life. For until we have secured our food supply we shall continue to be in jeopardy.

On the Mojave Desert is a settlement of 600 souls watered by a slender pipe line miles long, supplemented by wells which furnish water so alkaline that it can be used only for washing, and which gives the skin a curious sliminess. All the food of the community comes over a single-track railroad 30 miles long. The community can make no water, grow and capture no food on the desert. Nor would the community be better off if it consisted of 1 person instead of 600, including women and children, for the Mojave will not feed even a "desert rat." New York City has enough milk for a day and a half, other food for 3 days. Other communities are no better off, and if we all became farmers when our supplies fail it would do no good, for it takes time for food to be produced. Food is seasonal; it must be grown in summer and stored against the winter, spring, and summer, till the succeeding harvest refills the granaries, or it must be captured. Races dependent upon the chase, whether upon land or sea, are limited in numbers and live scattered over extended areas. But civilized man lives no less uncertainly, though less obviously in jeopardy, till war or pestilence or calamitous weather reveals his weakness. Perhaps you imagine I am indulging in diluted allusions to the doctrine of Malthus. Not so. What I have in mind goes much farther than Malthus; is truly wild if you will. While I believe what I think Malthus said about the relation of subsistence and population, I am saying that to insure any population beyond the sparsest and most active in the chase there must be due reward for the production of subsistence. The hunger of others will not cause you and me or anyone else to take the bread from the mouths of our wives and children or to rob them of their seed corn for the next year's harvest. We saw this very recently in Russia. The farmer will continue to support the town only if he is paid for it, not if he is forced to the wall in the struggle for existence. His work, the most necessary and hence the most important, deserves no less reward than that of others. If he had learned the arts of combination, we should know ourselves to be at his mercy. He seems to be at our mercy, for we force him to sell and to undersell his neighbor. The result is the diminishing farm population. If this goes too far, we shall all be hungry.

But if, instead of basing our civilization on an insecure food supply and pleasing ourselves with luxuries, we insure the production of food by proper compensation for the producer, we can be sure of the future. Then man, who has overcome the insufficient buoyancy of the air, the insufficient aeration of the sea, and the limitations of time and space, may look forward to a truly glorious development as the safest as well as the highest land animal.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I have been away from the Chamber for some minutes. We are considering part 2 of the bill, are we not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, Mr. President. Will the Senator from Louisiana withhold his amendment until certain perfecting amendments shall have been considered?

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it was the intention of the committee to go right on through with the mortgage provisions of the bill; but on account of the necessary absence of the Senator from New York, I ask unanimous consent, as we have finished title I, parts 1 and 2, so far as committee amendments are concerned, that we now take up title I, part 1, for such amendments as may be offered from the floor.

Mr. LONG. Did I understand the Senator to say part 1?

Mr. SMITH. I suggest that we start now with part 1, title I.

Mr. LONG. I can offer my amendment to either one of the sections. I would just as soon offer it to one as the other.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I suggest to the Senator that he have his amendment printed and let the so-called "perfecting amendments" be disposed of before taking up his amendment?

Mr. LONG. I suppose the perfecting amendments will be very brief, will they not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. LONG. My amendment has already been printed. I do not mean today, but at another session, and the Membership of the Senate are pretty familiar with it. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. LONG. However, I will wait until the Senator has finished with the perfecting amendments, and then I will offer my amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have some amendments of the character referred to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I beg to suggest that unanimous consent has not yet been given to the Senator from South Carolina and I want to be heard on the request.

Mr. SMITH. I ask unanimous consent that we take up title I of the bill and start with part 1 in order to perfect it, so that we will have nothing left then but the mortgage section.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I wish to cooperate with the able chairman of the committee, as he knows. The impression was given out, and properly so, that we would go through the bill in the logical order in which it is presented. A great many Senators, some of whom are absent, relied upon that understanding. I do not want to go back and take up title I, embodying, as it does, the cotton provision as well as the allotment plan for the consideration of individual amendments, and foreclose Senators who are now absent proposing amendments, when they have relied upon a continuation of the original program of going through the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not understand that it is the purpose to foreclose anybody at all. It seems to me that we might go on with these amendments so far as we can, and other Senators will have the right to offer amendments. I am sure the chairman of the committee will permit that to be done.

Mr. McNARY. I am on the floor to have an understanding about that, and I should like to have the chairman of the committee make it clear. There are some Members of the Senate who are necessarily absent who, I understand, have individual amendments to title I. I am willing to go back and take up title I, but I do not want to conclude it today so that on another day, if we shall spend another day on this bill—and undoubtedly we will—they will be prevented from offering their amendments by reason of their absence today.

Mr. SMITH. O Mr. President, I must say to my colleague on the committee that we will not close up title I today, but will agree to such amendments as we can.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I assumed that was the program, but I wanted a clear understanding about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to propose some amendments which I think will not be objected to. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 9, after the word "title", insert a comma and the following: "including regulations establishing conversion factors for any commodity and article processed therefrom to determine the amount of tax imposed or refunds to be made with respect thereto."

On page 14, line 14, after the word "title", strike out the remainder of the line and down through line 19.

Mr. McNARY. Just a moment, Mr. President. The clerk reads so rapidly that it is difficult to keep up with him. On what page does the amendment come?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On page 14. I can make a brief explanation of it, which, I think, will satisfy the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, under the bill as it is drafted the Secretary of the Treasury has authority to make what is called the conversion factors. The Secretary of the Treasury has asked that he be relieved of that duty and responsibility and that it be conferred on the Secretary of Agriculture, who has to perform practically all other functions under the bill. The Secretary of Agriculture is willing to have this change made. It is the only change the amendment makes.

Mr. McNARY. That is at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and of the Secretary of Agriculture, both.

Mr. McNARY. It is agreed to by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; that is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I offer another amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, at the end of line 21, insert the following:

Title II of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, to the extent that it provides for the impoundment of appropriations on account of reductions in compensation, shall not operate to require such impoundment under appropriations contained in this act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this amendment is requested by the Secretary of Agriculture. Unless the amendment be adopted, reductions in compensation under the bill would be impounded and would not be available for the administration of the act despite the fact that the revenues are to be raised by processing taxes. I think there can be no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not believe this was called to the attention of the committee, was it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, it was not. The amendment was suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture only a day or two ago when I presented it here. I submitted it to the Senator in charge of the bill and understood him to approve it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I now propose an amendment to which I ask the especial attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and other Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 7, line 8, after the word "parties" and the period, insert the following:

Such agreements and any act or acts done in pursuance thereof shall be presumed to be legal in any public or private proceeding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The bill authorizes the execution of processing agreements. Some who are expected to enter into those agreements have expressed the fear that if they should enter into agreements of the character in mind they might be held liable for prosecution under the antitrust law. The amendment is intended to make clear that if the Secretary of Agriculture and the processors do enter into agreements, the agreements shall be presumed to be legal.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I believe the proposal is to insert following the word "parties" on page 7, line 8?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the way I have it.

Mr. McNARY. The proposal was submitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and failed of adoption. Several members of the committee took the view that if that language were in the bill it would be calculated to satisfy the packers with respect to the consent decree which had been a question of much agitation, dispute, and litigation for a number of years. It is an unusual provision. I do not believe the processors need any comfort from the packers along that line. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] opposed it bitterly and successfully in the committee. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], who was interested in the Stockyards and Packers' Act and Grain Trading Act, also opposed it. In their absence I hope the Senator will not press the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well; I will withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I had intended to offer an amendment, but in view of the fact that certain Senators interested in it are absent I shall withhold it. If other Senators have amendments to offer they may do so now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on page 12, line 23, after the word "drying", and within the parentheses, I move to insert the words "or converting into insecticides and fertilizers."

The purpose of the amendment is this: The leavings or refuse of tobacco, that are of no value to anyone and that cannot be used for smoking or any other purpose for which tobacco is used, are used to make nicotine for the purpose of use as an insecticide. It is in general use in that form in California, Georgia, Virginia, and other States, and is a very valuable insecticide. The refuse is used as a fertilizer. That is a processing which I think ought to be added, and I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will accept the amendment and that the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I really believe this is a valuable amendment, for the reason that the character of tobacco that is used in producing this mixture is the sweepings of the floors and tobacco remnants that have been more or less damaged by rot and moisture. The nicotine that is extracted and now used in the form of insecticide is of more value to the farmers throughout the country in preserving certain forms of their growing crops than any loss that could be sustained by the Government because of it being incorporated in the bill. I think the amendment ought to be agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. The language proposed by the Senator from Tennessee would except from the operation of the bill tobacco and nicotine products of tobacco which are used for spraying throughout the horticultural districts of the country?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. The product is widely used on the Pacific coast, in the South, and in the East, wherever fruit is grown, of course. It is used on some vegetables. It is used in the hop culture. I am very familiar with it, having used it. But here is the proposition as I view it. Does it not offer an escape for a very large lot of tobacco and relieve it from the operations of the bill and hence from the payment of the tax?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am informed that it does not. I am informed that the nicotine is obtained from refuse tobacco that could not be used for any other purpose in the world. It would cut down the amount of taxes collectible if this tax were placed upon it and would deprive the fruit growers of the country of a very valuable insecticide.

Mr. McNARY. No; it will not do that. They will buy it anyway. It is just a question of furnishing these people this product and taking it out from the tax. I think it very unfair to put a product in the bill and then by exception take out a large portion of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a very insignificant part of it.

Mr. McNARY. It is purely a question of processing. That is indisputable. Large quantities of it are used in processing for this purpose. Is it fair to place tobacco in the bill and then take certain by-products of tobacco and free them from the operation of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I think it would be entirely fair in this case, if the Senator desires my opinion, because the product of nicotine, or insecticide, is made out of refuse that cannot be used in the ordinary processing in the strictest term of tobacco uses.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to yield to the Senator, who comes from a great tobacco-growing State.

Mr. BARKLEY. The nicotine, which is a by-product of tobacco, is used in the making of certain insecticides necessary to kill certain insects that cannot be reached by the ordinary insecticides. Out of a ton of tobacco we get about 50 pounds of such nicotine. It is not made out of salable tobacco. It is extracted out of what is called trash, leavings, cullings, stems, swept up off the floor. In many cases the processing tax will already have been paid on it in the ordinary process of manufacture, so that if this tax be paid again on this particular type of refuse, which is really what it is, it might result in the payment twice of the processing tax on the same tobacco.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to say, if the Senator from Tennessee will allow me——

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. Most of this nicotine is made from the large stems through the middle of the leaf and the branch stems which are taken out before the tobacco is processed for ordinary manufacturing purposes. As intimated, the tax will have been paid on it. The nicotine is extracted from that kind of tobacco, and the cheaper the nicotine the more generally will it be used, and the less will be the tax on agriculture and horticulture, the very ones that use it. I think that by eliminating it we get the tax on all that really ought to bear it and relieve the farmers from paying an extra tax for the insecticides.

Mr. BARKLEY. This particular conglomeration of unusable and unsalable tobacco is made up of leaves and stems and trash that is gathered up, that is hardly usable for any other purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is sometimes called "tobacco dust."

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. If the Senator had ever worked around a tobacco factory, he would understand that in the process of making cigars or cigarettes or any form of chewing tobacco there are always certain parts of the leaves and stems and remnants that are put in a pile and swept off into the corner and finally gathered up, and the nicotine is extracted. I do not think there would be any loss in taxes, but there might be a double taxation on the same product.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to enable me to have a correction of a typographical error in the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. On page 25 of the bill, in the amendment which was adopted yesterday, it reads as follows:

> The Secretary of Agriculture, in addition to the powers granted by parts 2 and 3 of this title—

That occurs in part 3. It ought to read 'parts 1 and 2." I ask unanimous consent that the correction may be made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the correction suggested by the Senator from Nebraska is necessary. It is evidently a typographical error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to making the correction? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. It is quite obvious that I am not conversant with the tobacco industry, but the bill has come to us from the Department of Agriculture, having the sanction of the farm leaders, our great major farm organizations. It passed the House and was reported to the Senate. I think we ought to be very careful about increasing the exceptions contained in the bill.

The Secretary of Agriculture was before us. There is nothing from him here saying that he wants these exceptions made larger for tobacco. We have now an exception for drying. We have added, or will add, fertilizers and insecticides.

Mr. McKELLAR. I doubt if anyone, unless he was very, very particularly conversant with the tobacco business, would have even known that this insecticide is made out of this refuse tobacco lying around the warehouse. It is really a tobacco dust to a very large extent; and, as has been stated here, the tax will have been paid already on the real part of the tobacco.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me ask the able Senator from Tennessee a question. He has been speaking of waste all the while.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Do all the nicotine and fertilizer ingredients come from waste tobacco, useless tobacco?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; but this is the only kind that is taken into consideration here. It is the waste.

Mr. McNARY. Where is the language to be found?

Mr. McKELLAR. The language is:

or converting into insecticides and fertilizers.

Good tobacco could not possibly be used for the purpose of fertilizers, and it could not be used for the purpose of obtaining nicotine for insecticides.

Mr. McNARY. Is the Senator familiar with the tobacco industry?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am.

Mr. McNARY. With all the processes of conversion?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not with all the processes of conversion, perhaps. I think that would require a very great expert; but I am fairly familiar with tobacco.

Mr. McNARY. I asked the able Senator if all the tobacco used in fertilizer, and in insecticides such as the one that was mentioned a moment ago—nicotine—is taken from waste tobacco; or is not some of it taken from commercial tobacco?

Mr. McKELLAR. None of it is taken from commercial tobacco.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Tobacco is not raised for the purpose of producing fertilizer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Or for the purpose of producing nicotine.

Mr. BARKLEY. Or for the purpose of producing nicotine.

If the Senator will permit me just a moment. Take a tobacco stalk. It is cut and cured in a barn. It is taken out afterward and stripped. All the leaves are broken off. That still leaves the stalk, which is a useless thing unless it can be converted into fertilizer; and it makes a very fine fertilizer. You can take a bundle of stalks and throw them on a field and let them lie over the winter, and the grass that will grow there in the spring will be infinitely greener and larger and more healthy than the grass all around the place. These stalks are not salable for any purpose at all. They are thrown out in a pile, and sometimes are used for fertilizer.

Then the rib that runs down the middle is taken out, leaving the fiber for use either in cigars, cigarettes, or smoking tobacco. That rib or stem is not salable for any purpose. It is simply thrown in a pile of waste; but there is a certain liquid in it, a juice that can be extracted, that goes into nicotine. That is what is used in the manufacture of this insecticide. There is no other disposition that can be made of that waste, except for that purpose.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no very great interest in the matter; but I do not want to see this bill so framed and fashioned as to favor any one product mentioned in it upon which a sales tax is to be paid, or a processor's tax.

It seems to me, from the very statement made by the Senator, that this is a product either of value or of no value. If it is waste, then it has not any commercial value. Then any use made of it certainly would not come within the provisions of the bill. If it is made out of a commercial tobacco, then this would be a processing.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not made out of commercial tobacco, I will say to the Senator. There is nobody in any State of the Union that I know of who raises tobacco purely for the purpose of making fertilizer or insecticide. It is a byproduct that was discovered in the process of manufacturing tobacco into a usable commodity.

Mr. McKELLAR. The same thing is applicable to the corn stalks raised in the Senator's State, or wheat stalks, or wheat chaff.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is a certain portion of every leaf of tobacco that is wholly unusable either for chewing, smoking, or any other ordinary purpose for which tobacco is used.

Mr. McNARY. Has the Senator any figures to show what the aggregate sum of money is that would escape the processor's tax by reason of this exemption?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know that any of it would escape, because, as a matter of fact, in the ordinary factory where raw tobacco is used in making smoking tobacco, or plug chewing tobacco, or cigars, or cigarettes, as I understand, the tax will be paid on the entire product that is to be processed. In the processing there is a certain amount of waste that goes out to one side, upon which there has been already a tax paid. Out of that waste this other byproduct is made. I have not looked into the figures; but, even if any of it should escape the tax, it would be an infinitestimal amount.

Mr. McNARY. I assume from the statement of the very able Senator from Tennessee that this is pure waste; stalks and leaves that are not processed at all, upon which no tax has been paid. It is the refuse of that which is commercial.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, every stalk from which 10 leaves of tobacco have been stripped—that is what we call it, stripping tobacco—is useless as a commercial product. There are certain great factories that are known as "stemmeries", where the process of taking the stem out of the tobacco, as I said a while ago, is carried on. The mid rib—I suppose it might be called—running down the leaf is taken out so as to leave the pure fiber; and sometimes even the lateral stems are likewise removed. That stem has no salable value for any purpose. It cannot be used for anything unless what is in it in the way of liquid is extracted for whatever use it may be put to.

I am under the impression that this tobacco will already have paid the processing tax before the stem is separated or before the broken or torn parts of the leaf have been thrown aside as unusable in the manufacture of cigars or cigarettes. I doubt very seriously whether there really will be any escape of the processor's tax.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the Senator from Tennessee whether this amendment has been submitted to the Secretary of Agriculture or some of his advisers.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it has not.

Mr. McNARY. What prompted the Senator to offer it on the floor?

Mr. McKELLAR. Some of those interested in tobacco in my State both wrote me and came to see me about it. They regarded this as simply a refuse that a tax of this kind, or of any kind, would prevent being used at all, while at present they are able to make a reasonably good article out of it.

Mr. McNARY. If we enter upon the adoption of a very large number of exceptions, we are going to ruin the purpose and plan of the bill.

Let me suggest to the Senator that he submit this amendment to the Secretary and get his reaction. I shall be very glad to know what he thinks about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment. This is an amendment that has relation to the time of the commencement of the processing tax. Under the language of the bill, on page 10—

The processing tax with respect to any basic agricultural commodity shall commence on the date of proclamation by the Secretary of Agriculture that rental or benefit payments are to be made with respect to such commodity.

The amendment that is proposed contemplates that the processing tax shall take effect commencing with the next marketing year, rather than immediately on the determination that rental or benefit payments are to be made. This will permit the reduction program to have effect, and the farmer to receive the payments and to purchase industrial commodities before the processing tax is reflected in the price to the consumer.

The amendment is suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture. I ask for its adoption.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee state what disposition is made of the amendment offered by him?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall have to withdraw the amendment that I offered, so that the Senator from Arkansas can introduce his; and that I do for the present.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It will be necessary to have unanimous consent to present this amendment, or to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment on page 10 was agreed to; so I am just asking unanimous consent to present it to the committee amendment.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator is not asking that it be considered at this time?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Let us have it stated, then. I really do not know what it is.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I explain to the Senator what it is?

Mr. FESS. Let us have it read.

Mr. McNARY. After the reading I shall be glad to have the Senator explain it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, line 18, it is proposed to strike out the word "The", and down through line 22 of the amendment proposed to be inserted, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

When the Secretary of Agriculture determines that rental or benefit payments are to be made with respect to any basic agricultural commodity, he shall proclaim such determination, and a processing tax shall be in effect with respect to such commodity from the beginning of the marketing year therefor next following the date of such proclamation.

Mr. McNARY. Now, Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Arkansas would make a statement regarding the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have already explained it, but I will repeat the explanation.

The language that is stricken out makes the processing tax take effect immediately upon the issuance of a proclamation or the granting of benefits. This amendment provides that the processing tax shall take effect at the beginning of the marketing year, so as to permit the reduction program to have its effect, and the farmer to receive the benefits before the processing tax is reflected in the price to the consumer. It is proposed by the Department as a perfecting amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to reconsideration of the vote whereby the committee amendment on page 10 was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment in line 11, page 6: After the word "procured", strike out the period and insert a colon and the following language:

Provided further, That the provisions of part 2 shall not apply to part 1.

That amendment, if adopted, would mean that the processing provisions of part 2 will not apply to cotton, but that the cotton situation will be left in exactly the same position as it was under the Smith bill which passed the Senate at the last session of Congress.

Mr. McNARY. It does not affect the so-called "Smith plan" or cotton-option contract provision, does it?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. McNARY. Let it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 11, after the word "procured" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That the provisions of part 2 shall not apply to part 1.

Mr. McNARY. This amendment is offered to the cotton-option contract provision?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is.

Mr. McNARY. And the Senator does not want the allotment and rental benefit provisions to apply to the Smith plan?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. The amendment is for the purpose of permitting the Smith plan to go into this bill just as it passed the Senate in the last Congress.

Mr. McNARY. Let us see how that works. Let me see if I understand the Senator.

Under the Smith plan, the Secretary of Agriculture is to enter into a contract with a producer——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator pardon me for just one moment? Instead of entering into a contract, the first thing that has to happen is that all the cotton now held by the various departments of the Government is to be turned over to one board.

Mr. McNARY. Of course.

Mr. McKELLLAR. And then that board enters into a contract with the producer.

Mr. McNARY. Of course. The Senator is anticipating what I was going to say. I think I am familiar with the Smith proposal, and it applies only to Government-owned cotton, or that upon which the Government holds liens to the full amount of the present market price of cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. Then the Secretary of Agriculture is entitled to enter into an option contract whereby on the promise to decrease acreage by a cotton grower he can have an option to purchase a portion of the cotton now owned by him. Let us assume a cotton grower. The Senator wants to take that grower out of the allotment provision of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. McNARY. If he reduces his acreage from 30 acres of cotton to 20 acres, and has a contract with the Secretary of Agriculture, the Senator does not want the 20 acres that will bear cotton this year to come within the provisions of part 2.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. McNARY. Is that fair to the cotton growers of the country?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is, because there is an entirely different situation in regard to cotton than in regard to any other product. The Government now owns a surplus of cotton amounting to over 3,000,000 bales. Under the Smith plan it was so arranged that the Government could use that in the way of options to the farmer and reduce not only the acreage but the production of cotton, do away in 1 year, as I believe, with the entire surplus now existing, and in that way greatly benefit the cotton grower. To my mind it is one of the most admirable plans that has ever been suggested for doing away with the surplus, and the reason why it is put in a different category from other products is that it is the only product of which the Government now owns and controls a large surplus.

Mr. McNARY. I know; but the Senator from Tennessee is not putting his finger upon the real point, in my opinion. Of course it is a fine thing and a laudable purpose for the Secretary of Agriculture to reduce the surplus by these optional contracts, but the grower who has the option and still is raising cotton for this year in competition with the growers who have no option would be exempted by the Senator from this tax, if I understand his amendment. If that is the purpose of the amendment, it is iniquitous and unfair to the cotton growers.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will allow me, the purpose of it is this: First, we have the unusual fact that 55 percent of the cotton, to state it conservatively, is exported. In order to raise the price of cotton under the allotment plan to the pre-war figure, taking that as the base period, such a percentage of it is exported that in order to bring the cotton up to the 12 cents figured out as being the basis of the purchasing power of cotton, under the base period, we would have to raise the 45 percent domestically consumed to 21 cents a pound in order to have an average on all the crops of 12 cents a pound. Cotton stands in a category to itself. The major part of our crop is exported.

I want to reiterate, so that the Senate will understand, that if we were to attempt to raise the average price of our cotton to where the farmer would receive an average of 12 cents a pound, we would have to raise the domestically consumed to 21 cents a pound, the other being 30 cents, so that if we multiply the 55 percent, the number of bales exported, by $30 a bale, and the 45 per cent by $105 a bale, and add the two together, we would get $63 a bale, or approximately 12 cents a pound. So that it is manifestly impossible to raise the price of cotton to the figure of the base period, or even approach it, under this allotment plan; but under the plan I have suggested, which was adopted by the Senate and the House, if we take the surplus cotton now existing and substitute it for the production this year, which we can do, then we will reduce the surplus and also reduce production, and, as we have a practical monopoly of the world's production of cotton, we could get a better price for all the cotton than we could hope to get through the taxing process under the allotment plan.

Mr. McKELLAR. Only as to 45 percent of it.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; only as to 45 percent of it. Even taking the 45 percent, if we add 6 cents to the present price and average it, cotton would bring only 7¾ cents. So that the objects of this amendment would be to let cotton have the full benefit of the allotment plan, without the tax being imposed on the 45 percent, to such an extent as to bring it to something like a parity with the pre-war period.

Under the crop-production fund there is an agreement, a contract, that the growers must reduce 30 percent, and under the regional Agricultural Credit Corporation there is also an agreement for a reduction of 30 percent, which, added to the substitution proposed, would bring about a reduction which I think would result in a price for our cotton that would be more satisfactory.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. To me there is something confusing in the language employed in the amendment. I may be in error, but it does not seem to me to be clear what will be accomplished if the amendment be agreed to. The language of the amendment, as I recall it, is " The provisions of part 2 shall not apply to part 1."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that means this: That the processing provisions provided for in part 2 will not apply to cotton. That is the purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not wish to attempt to influence the Senator to modify his amendment, but it does seem to me it could be made clearer by making it read, " The provisions of part 2 shall not apply to the existing stocks of the commodity described in part 1 ", or something like that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very happy to accept that amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should like to ask a question. Do the provisions of part 3 apply to the cotton mentioned in part 1?

Mr. SMITH. Part 3 has reference to mortgages.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; part 3 has reference to cost of production.

Mr. SMITH. Part 2 ought to be included.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was just wondering whether it was the intention of the Senator to exempt it from part 2 and not from part 3.

Mr. SMITH. No; from part 3 also.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Part 3 provides for the cost of production.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall be very happy to modify my amendment and make it read as follows:

Provided further, That the provisions of parts 2 and 3 shall not apply to the commodity mentioned in part 1.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, unless I wholly misunderstand, the desire of the able Senator from Tennessee is to take cotton out from part 2.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is; the Senator has hit the nail right on the head.

Mr. McNARY. Part 2 refers to the allotment provision.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr President, it was stated, in answer to a question of the Senator from Oregon a few moments ago, that the object was to take the stocks of cotton in the possession of the Farm Board out of part 2, and, so the amendment is modified, out of part 3. That is a very different proposition from taking cotton out as a basic commodity.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator means the future cotton crop?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Cotton hereafter to be grown. That is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. McNARY. I want to know about what we are trying to do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am sincerely desirous of knowing what we are about to do. It looks to me as though we are about to slip cotton out of the allotment features of this bill.

Mr. SMITH. That is right; what we are attempting to do is to leave cotton in part 1 as it passed the Senate, segregated from the allotment plan and the cost-of-production plan, and take it out under part 2, in which it finds itself. That is the object of this amendment, for the reason that by no process can we figure any profit to accrue from the application of that law.

Mr. McNARY. Now, I have it from the able Senator from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, that the desire is to take cotton out of the alleged benefits of part 2, which is the allotment feature of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. That is what the intent of this amendment is.

Mr. McNARY. So that it would provide that the basic agricultural commodities consist of wheat, corn, hogs, tobacco, and rice, cotton being omitted.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; except as it is affected by part 1.

Mr. McNARY. That is unusual, revolutionary, and wholly against the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture. It is regrettable that I have to stand here on the floor and defend your Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I do not think this proposition as presented by the Senator from Tennessee was ever brought to the attention of the present Secretary of Agriculture. I have tried to show, and I think anyone may just sit down and take the figures and see, that under the allotment plan it would be impossible to benefit cotton to any extent at all, or at least appreciably, because 55 percent of it has to go at the world price, 45 percent at whatever bid or price or tax may be placed upon it. Therefore, if cotton is left in part 1 and allowed the substitution it provides for, together with the reduction which is now being carried on under the crop-reduction fund, I see no reason in the world why we may not get a reasonable return, without any tax whatever being added.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest, Mr. President, that if it is desired to take cotton out of the bill, except in part I, why not do it by striking it out on page 16 where the basic commodities are enumerated? That will end it all; that will take it out.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment. If we adopt this amendment, we will still have in the bill this language:

As used in this title, the term "basic agricultural commodity" means wheat, cotton—

And so forth.

If we are going to provide in another portion of the bill that it shall not apply to cotton, why not do it by striking out cotton as one of the enumerated basic commodities? It will still be in part I, because it is mentioned by name there. Striking out the word "cotton" on page 16 would accomplish what is desired.

Mr. SMITH. I think that would be preferable.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We were told that the object of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee was to exempt from the provisions of part II the stocks of cotton in the possession of the Farm Board. That raised a question which was quite different from the one now at issue. The one now at issue involves the problem as to whether we will limit to the Smith option cotton plan all the prospective benefits under the bill so far as cotton is concerned. I am not willing to do that, and I do not believe the Senate wants to do it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If I have the floor, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Arkansas has put his finger on the situation. The first question I propounded to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] was whether he desired to take out of the operation of part II only such cotton as was owned by the Government, and I understood that was the purpose. Now the Senator from South Carolina says the purpose is, except as to part I, to remove cotton from the operation of the bill whether it is owned by the Government or whether it is privately owned.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not think the amendment does that. I think that all the amendment proposed by me does is to take the cotton that is now held and owned by the Government out of the plan.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, as a matter of fact, does cotton now held by the Farm Board come under part 2 of this bill?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. McNARY. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. Why take it out, then, when it is not in?

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from South Carolina goes so far as to say that on page 16, line 8, wherein basic agricultural commodities are defined, he wants to strike out the word "cotton."

Mr. SMITH. I do. Mr. President, I do not want any misunderstanding. I think, in view of the fact that such a tremendous percentage of our cotton is exported, that the equalization provisions will not be a benefit; but if we allow the cotton we now have in possession of the Government to be eliminated in lieu of that much production, together with such reduction of acreage as the crop-reduction plan may bring about, without interfering with any processing whatever, it will be of benefit. In view of the fact that we have a practical monopoly of the world's production of cotton and are dependent upon the foreign market to absorb 55 or 60 percent, I think that the processing-tax provision will disappoint every cotton grower, for the reason that, at the point to which it is proposed to raise it, it will not benefit the grower a quarter of a cent a pound.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest to the Senator that part 1 applies to cotton now in existence or controlled by the Government. That is all it does do.

Mr. SMITH. Yes. But, Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment. Suppose we carry out part 1; that cotton cannot be used twice; after that cotton is used, then it will not be subject to the other portions of the bill in the future so far as their application to cotton is concerned. So, after the first year has gone by, it will be impossible to carry out the provision of part 1, because when the plan under part 1 is once put in operation it ends as soon as the cotton owned by the Government is disposed of. Then, the following year, if the amendment were agreed to, it would be impossible, of course, to apply any of the other provisions to cotton if the Secretary wanted to do so.

I should like to add, if the Senator will permit me, that I myself have no objection to striking it out of the bill if that is what the cotton representatives want; but it seems to me that unless they are practically unanimous in the desire to strike it out I would not want to do it, because we will have eliminated cotton forever from the operations of the bill just so soon as we get through with the sale of the cotton now owned by the Government, and there will be no authority to do anything for the cotton grower 1 year after the bill was put in operation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. What the Senator from Nebraska said would be true if his suggested amendment striking out cotton, on page 16, were adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator from South Carolina, with his usual fairness—and I commend him for it—says that the object of this amendment is to take cotton out of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think it goes that far.

Mr. NORRIS. If it does, then we ought to take it out by striking it out, which would have the effect that it would make it forever impossible after the present cotton owned by the Government is disposed of for the bill to have any effect whatever with respect to cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would not be true unless on page 16, line 8, the word "cotton" were stricken out. If the amendment offered were adopted, it would apply to the present surplus.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the cotton men have not agreed among themselves as to what effect this amendment would have.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6, line 11, after the word "procured", it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That the provisions of parts 2 and 3 shall not apply to the commodity mentioned in part 1.

Mr. BARKLEY. That takes it out all right.

Mr. McNARY. That takes cotton out of the provision relating to the cost of production, and it also takes it out of the benefits under the acreage-reduction plan and the so-called "allotment plan."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I understand, part 1 applies now to cotton owned by the Government. Is not that correct? Undoubtedly it is. The only effect of this amendment is not to apply the provisions of parts 2 and 3 to the particular cotton now owned by the Government. It is true that the Senator from South Carolina said he thought it ought to be taken out entirely; but that, in my judgment, is not what this amendment does.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it does under the language as it is drawn.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if what the Senator from Tennessee says would be accomplished, he might just as well withdraw the amendment or the Senate might just as well not agree to it, because so long as section 1 is in operation the Secretary will operate under the authority there given in the case of the existing cotton, and, I take it, will not apply the other provisions of the bill to cotton during the same time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not at all sure about that; I think he would have to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Unless all the cotton men agree, I should dislike to see cotton stricken out, although I do not believe any secretary would in the first year apply part 2 to cotton; he could operate under part 1.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee would modify his amendment so as to provide that it shall not apply beyond 1933, I think the purpose of the amendment would be accomplished.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has been on his feet for some time. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield and, if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH. I yield first to my colleague.

Mr. BYRNES. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. Part 1 refers not only to a commodity, but it refers by its very title to "cotton option contracts" and describes certain contracts and the transactions to be carried on with reference to those contracts. Under the language of the Senator's amendment the provisions of part 2, relating to the allotment plan, shall not apply to part 1. Is it not left very vague and indefinite as to what is meant by the amendment, because it would indicate that the allotment plan shall not apply to the contracts which are referred to in part 1?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it merely makes it perfectly clear that the processing tax shall not apply to the cotton that is covered by part 1; that is all.

Mr. BYRNES. I want to suggest to the Senator if that is his intention, why does he not say in the amendment that the provisions of part 2 shall not apply to cotton in the custody or control of the department of the Government referred to in part 1?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator to listen to the amendment, and he will see that it does apply to it.

Provided further, That the provisions of parts 2 and 3 shall not apply to the commodities mentioned in part 1.

Mr. BYRNES. I did not hear the word "parts" in the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is exactly what the Senator from South Carolina now suggests.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is this confusion in thought there: The commodity in part 1 is cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And it is the equivalent of saying that part 2 and part 3 shall not apply to cotton. That is the construction a court would place on it. So I think, if the Senator wishes to limit his provision to the cotton referred to in part 1, all he has to do is to say so.

Mr. McKELLAR. In other words, instead of applying it to the commodity apply it to the stocks of cotton.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As described in part 1.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, on page 4, subsections (a) and (b) and (c), provision is made for selling back the surplus cotton to the farmers provided they leave their lands lying idle.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. LONG. I think the Senator's amendment will complicate that feature of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why and how?

Mr. LONG. There will be interwoven with the stock of cotton contracts to be made with farmers that they are not to plant any more cotton on their land next year, as a consequence of which there is to be sold back to them some of the cotton now held.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and, of course, if the provisions of part 2 and 3 apply to the cotton that is sold back, it would complicate the matter very much, whereas if we insert such a provision as is now suggested by the Senator from Arkansas to the effect—

Provided further, That the provisions of part 2 and 3 shall not apply to the stocks of cotton in part 1.

That would absolutely eliminate the stocks of cotton now held by the Government; and they ought to be eliminated, as I think every Senator here will agree from the provisions of part 2 and 3, providing for the processing tax on cotton. I do not think we ought to apply the processing-tax feature to cotton that is already in existence and is already owned by the Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If part 3, which is the cost of production plan, is likewise not to apply, and if it will be unlawful under this bill for a farmer who produces cotton to sell it for a price below the price proclaimed by the Secretary of Agriculture, why should the Government be allowed to do it with respect to cotton which it has?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not see that that changes the situation at all.

Mr. BARKLEY. If we are going to put the farmer in jail, why not also put the Government in jail?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not believe we could put the Government in jail.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. What is going to be done with a man who buys this cotton?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee still hold the floor?

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask, Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Alabama or to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to both. First I yield to the Senator from Louisiana, and then I will yield to the Senator from Alabama. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. LONG. I will let the Senator from Alabama go ahead first.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this is a highly confusing situation. To begin with, the amendment is in such language that no one can quite understand what it is sought to do, and I am thankful to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] for uncovering what underlies the proposal.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is nothing secret about it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand that.

Mr. McKELLAR. We are trying to make this language as specific as possible, and I am surprised that the Senator from Alabama cannot understand it. All I am proposing to do is not to permit cotton now in the hands of the Government to be subjected to the plans provided in parts 2 and 3. That is all; it is just as plain and open as I know how to make it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator's statement has been perfectly frank, entirely so; but let us see what effect it will have. I am afraid the Senator has not fully considered that point. He says it is not his object to take cotton out of the bill except so far as the Smith plan is concerned, and cotton under the Smith plan is not to be subject to the processing tax.

One of the principal values of the bill, from the standpoint of many of us from the cotton section, is the hope that by reason of the breaking of acreage, production will be materially decreased and thereby we will get rid of a large part of the terrible surplus hanging over the market.

The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is, under his construction of it and assuming that it goes no further, to eliminate about 3,000,000 bales of cotton. What will be the effect of that and why should that be done? Why should the 3,000,000 bales of cotton be exempt? The producers of cotton are not exempt from the processing tax, but how much will be processed? Less than 5,000,000 bales in its entirety will pay the processing tax. The Senator's amendment proposes to reduce that 5,000,000 by approximately 3,000,000 bales, so we will have less than 2,000,000 bales upon which the processing tax is to be paid. With that very great reduction in income, everyone familiar with the situation knows that whether intended or not, and I do not think it is so intended, it absolutely destroys the effectiveness of any plan in the bill that may be put in operation with reference to cotton. We cannot put the allotment plan into effect, and I hope in practice it will not be put into effect, but I do not want to take cotton out of the bill. We cannot secure tax money enough. If the Senator's amendment is adopted, it will not leave any substantial amount of acreage for that purpose, nor will it bring about the hoped-for results in reduction of production.

But let us take another viewpoint. The Senator proposes to exempt from the tax about 3,000,000 bales of cotton now owned by the Government. Naturally, the 3,000,000 bales will be bought at once by the millers. They will take that cotton instead of buying cotton from the farmers. It would, therefore operate as a destruction of the purchasing power of the farmer to the extent of the entire quantity of cotton owned at this time by the Government.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] clearly went to another defect and difficulty in the amendment, and that is taking sections 2 and 3 entirely away from cotton. It not only reduces the amount of taxes to be acquired for that purpose but eliminates it from the leasing plan, the very plan that most of us, or at least I, prefer. We prefer the application of the leasing plan.

Mr. LONG. As a matter of fact, it would do away with the leasing plan, would it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; the amendment has taken it away from us. If the Senate wants to destroy this plan so far as one of the basic commodities is concerned, here is an effective amendment to accomplish that purpose. We might as well strike it out entirely, because when we take 3,000,000 bales out of less than 5,000,000 upon which the tax can be paid, we eliminate the possibility of applying either the allotment plan or the leasing plan.

I have undertaken no poll of Senators from the Cotton States, but I know that so far as I am concerned I am not in accord with this effort to take cotton out and leave wheat and other commodities in the plan. Nobody has ever proposed in the consideration of the bill in the Senate to take cotton or wheat, the two principal basic commodities, out of this plan. Certain Senators have sincerely advocated limiting the commodities to wheat and cotton, but this is the first suggestion from the time of the introduction of the bill during the last session of Congress until the present time that I have ever heard from any source to take either one of those two great basic agricultural commodities out from the bill.

I have supported the Smith plan. I supported it in the last session. I hope it will be helpful to some extent. But if we have nothing but the Smith plan left for cotton, then I would say that the bill is inoperative in the main substantially and not of real effect in the whole cotton area of the country. I say that in my judgment the Smith plan will help. I have advocated it all the time. But any thoughtful man knows that with 13,000,000 bales of carryover cotton, with an annual consumption less than that amount, with a 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 bale reduction in the production of cotton alone, it will not make operative the declared purpose and policy of the bill, which is to adjust supply to demand in an effective way so as to get a fair and reasonable price consistent with the prices paid for industrial commodities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to offer an amendment at this time.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the Senator offers his amendment let me say that there are certain amendments which will be offered later to part 1. Some Senators interested in long staple cotton have asked an opportunity to examine an amendment which has been proposed relating to that subject. If there are no other amendments to be offered to part 1, then the Senator from Louisiana may as well offer his amendment at this time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer to part 1. I wish to offer the amendment to be inserted at the end of part 1, on page 6, after line 11. I want it inserted as a new section 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Louisiana offers the following amendment:

On page 6, after line 11, to insert the following new sections:

"TITLE III. CURRENCY EXPANSION

"SEC. 8. To expand the currency to restore confidence the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase silver bullion and to pay for same by issuing to the seller or sellers silver certificates in denominations of $1, $5, $10, $20, and $100 payable to bearer on demand. And he shall continue to purchase and so pay for same so long as the average daily market price of silver bullion is not 10 cents an ounce in excess of the average daily market price for the preceding 90 days, until 371¼ grains of fine silver reaches a parity in value with 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine; and should the market price of silver bullion, at any time, so decline as to destroy such parity, the Secretary of the Treasury is instructed to immediately resume the purchase of silver bullion until such parity is restored.

"SEC. 9. The silver certificates authorized to be issued under this title are hereby made legal tender and shall be accepted at their full face value for all debts and dues, public and private, of every nature and description, and when accepted by the Government shall be reissued and in all respects shall become a part of the lawful money of the United States.

"SEC. 10. There shall be engraved on one side of each silver certificate so issued, 'This certifies that there is on deposit in the Treasury of the United States silver bullion equivalent when valued in gold to the face value of this certificate', and on the reverse side, 'This certificate is legal tender for all debts, both public and private.'

"SEC. 11. The bullion purchased under this title shall be stored in the Treasury of the United States in blocks or bricks of standardized and uniform fineness and in convenient units by weight and stamped by authorized official stamp, as may be determined within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"SEC. 12. The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to issue additional certificates against said silver bullion so acquired and deposited in the Treasury under this title: Provided, That the amount of silver bullion so acquired and on deposit in the Treasury as aforesaid exceeds by 10 percent in value all certificates issued against same, including the additional certificates when valued in gold. The additional certificates so issued shall be put in circulation by discharging current obligations of the Government.

"SEC. 13. Should at any time the amount of silver bullion acquired and deposited in the Treasury under this title become in value less than 10 percent in excess of the face value of all certificates outstanding against same, the Secretary of the Treasury shall at once proceed to purchase a sufficient amount of silver bullion and deposit same in the Treasury until the amount on deposit in the Treasury shall exceed by 10 percent in value the total face value of all certificates issued and outstanding against same, and the sum of $100,000,000 is hereby appropriated to be used for that purpose, if necessary.

"SEC. 14. Upon the presentation for redemption by the bearer of silver certificates provided for in this title, there shall be delivered to the holder of the certificate an amount of silver equal to the gold equivalent in value of the certificate so presented at the market price of silver as of the day prior to the date of presentation: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the option of redeeming said certificates in gold in lieu of silver at their full face value.

"SEC. 15. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this title."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment just offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the proposed substitute.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Montana offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, as follows:

SEC. 34. That the proportional value of silver to gold in all coins which are by law current as money within the United States shall be as 16 to 1, according to quantity in weight, of pure silver or pure gold; that is to say, every 16 pounds weight of pure silver shall be of equal value in all payments with 1 pound weight of pure gold, and so in proportion as to any greater or less quantities of the respective metals.

SEC. 35. There shall be free coinage of both gold and silver, at the ratio fixed in this title, subject to the conditions and limitations now provided by law with respect to the coinage of gold; and all the laws of the United States relating to such coinage or to recoinage, exchange, or conversion of coins, bars, or bullion of gold, shall apply equally, so far as practicable, to silver.

SEC. 36. The dollar, consisting of 25 $\frac{8}{10}$ grains of gold nine tenths fine or of 412½ grains of silver nine tenths fine, shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understand we will recess very soon. Under the rule will my amendment and the substitute of the Senator from Montana be printed, so we will have them in that form in the morning?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I presume it would not be practicable to dispose of the amendment or the substitute this afternoon. I should like to ask for a brief executive session at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I present a proposed substitute for section (c) on page 22, and ask that it may be printed for the information of the Senate and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM GREEN AS TO ORGANIZATION OF SCHOOL TEACHERS

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement issued by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, dealing with the problem of school teachers. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The American Federation of Teachers was chartered by the American Federation of Labor for the purpose of creating an opportunity through which the teachers of the Nation could organize into and associate themselves with an organization of their fellow workers in all walks of life for mutual helpfulness and protection.

The teachers of the Nation occupy a very large place in the minds and hearts of all classes of people. One can truthfully say that they are generally held in high regard and in high esteem. They occupy a very close relationship to the home life and the family life of the Nation. The very importance and dignity of their service and their position command sincere respect. But even though the fathers and mothers of the Nation entrust their children to the care and training of the teachers in our schools, colleges, and universities, there is a manifestation of indifference approximating total disregard, in some places, of the economic and social welfare of the school teachers of the Nation. This fact and the experience through which the public schools of the Nation and the teachers have passed during the last 3 years serve to demonstrate the fact that the salvation of the teachers, their economic well-being and welfare depend upon their own efforts, upon the exercise of their individual and collective influence.

It has been made clear that they cannot protect their wages, salaries, and their living standards except through organized action and organized activity. School teachers, like all other groups of citizens, are helpless as individuals but can be made strong and influential when organized into a strong economic and social force.

The value and need of organization among teachers has been clearly established. If the teachers are to save themselves, if they are to protect and promote their economic and social interests, if their living standards are to be placed upon a plane commensurate with the requirements of their profession and their social status, they must unite and contend vigorously together for the realization and enjoyment of these priceless blessings.

Let no teacher labor under the illusion in these days of mass consideration and mass action, of keen competition and blind commercialism, that he or she can secure and maintain an economic and social status in keeping with the teaching profession because of personal or individual merit. Cruel, stern, economic law and economic pressure do not recognize individual merit, social standing, or special training.

Let the teachers organize and organize effectively for mutual help and mutual protection. The opportunity is here and the organization which the teachers of the Nation ought to join is functioning. The hosts of labor, those who make up the great organized labor movement, appeal to the teachers of the Nation to join with them, to come with them, and to work with them in the establishment of higher living standards and in the fight which the wage earners and salary earners of the Nation are making to bring about the realization of American ideals.

The teachers can save themselves, they can save the public schools of the Nation, and can establish decent living standards through organization and through affiliation with the American Federation of Teachers. Isolated, individualistic, acting separately and alone they will be forced to endure indefinitely the suffering which so many of them now experience.

In behalf of all those associated with the American Federation of Labor I appeal to the teachers of the Nation to organize through affiliation with the American Federation of Teachers.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Frank T. Bell, of Washington, to be Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, vice Henry O'Malley.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, personally I am very sympathetic with and support this nomination; but a Senator who is absent said to me that he would like to have it go over for the day.

Mr. DILL. What Senator was it?

Mr. McNARY. The Senator who objected yesterday, I think.

Mr. DILL. If the Senator refers to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], I talked with him twice since he made his objection, and he said that he had no objection.

Mr. McNARY. Very well, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Frank Murphy, of Michigan, to be Governor General of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. DILL. I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of all three confirmations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified of the confirmation of all the nominations.

That completes the calendar.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, APRIL 14, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Thou Christ the Crucified One and Mary's Holy Child, consider and hear us. The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: Thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J.Res. 152. Joint resolution to provide for the payment of pages for the Senate and House of Representatives for the first session of the Seventy-third Congress.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message from the President announced that he did on March 24, 1933, approve and sign a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 3757. An act to provide for direct loans by Federal Reserve banks to State banks and trust companies in certain cases.

LABOR, THE SWEATSHOP, AND THE ANTITRUST LAW

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain excerpts of a radio symposium on labor, the sweatshop, and antitrust law in New York City on April 9, 1933.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

[Reprint from the Gaelic American]

In the radio forum hour, broadcast over WOR on Sunday afternoon, April 9, the entire time was given to an instructive and forward-looking symposium on Labor, the sweatshop, and the Antitrust Law.

The speakers were Mr. Jeremiah D. Maguire, president of the Federation Bank & Trust Co., which is recognized as the outstanding labor banking institution of the country; Prof. George J. Langley, of Pace Institute; and Hon. Leslie J. Tompkins, well-known New York lawyer and professor of law at New York University.

MR. MAGUIRE'S ADDRESS

Mr. Maguire reviewed the 30-hour week labor bill, designed to limit the hours of employment in production or manufacture of articles for interstate commerce, as passed by the United States Senate on April 7. Mr. Maguire said, in part:

"We must still recognize that the American worker should receive, for his labor, a rate of remuneration which will enable him to live according to the accepted American standard, and enable him, during the years of his normal working life, to lay aside at least moderate saving against the inevitable rainy day and against the years of old age."

Continuing, Mr. Maguire said: "We must afford to the manufacturer of the country sufficient latitude to so conduct his business that the business shall show a fair return upon the capital invested, after payment to the laborer of that fair wage which comports with our American standard of living." Mr. Maguire added that, "As the current earning statements of industry show a picture of normal profits, the bankers can normally fulfill, to appropriate extent, all the functions of bankers in taking care of the needs of industry."

PROFESSOR LANGLEY'S TALK

Professor Langley traced the history through its early phases of pre-Christian individualism, up into the best cooperative attainments of the guilds of the Middle Ages, and eloquently painted the picture of the forced competition and overexpansion and forced selling which led into the depression of the last 4 years. Professor Langley pleaded for the liberalization of outmoded legislation and the inauguration of a new era of social justice which would permit the United States to better fulfill her destiny.

PROFESSOR TOMPKINS REVIEWS CURRENT LEGISLATION

Professor Tompkins reviewed the proposals of current proposed legislation to this end, and said, in part: "Before proceeding to explain the provisions of the Senator David I. Walsh bill, may I refer to former Governor Smith's program for public buildings, in which it is proposed to spend upwards of two or more billions of dollars. Without a modification of our statute laws of today, all of the materials for construction must be produced under unbridled competition, which will result in a loss to the producer. Labor will be obliged to work at reduced rates and raw materials will be sold at unprofitable prices, in many instances below the cost of securing. The net result will be that the country is actually poorer at the completion of the program than it was at the commencement. On the other hand, were we to modify our laws in line with the suggested principles of the Walsh bill, be the appropriations small or great, the raw material will be sold at a fair price and the producer or manufacturer will be able to put in a schedule of cost that will include a fair wage for labor, earn a reasonable return upon his invested capital, and at the end of each day the country will be just a little richer and a little further along the road to prosperity. You may well say that this is not new, but not only must memory be recalled 'lest we forget', but we must act as well as think. Should you see the matter in the way we are presenting it, yours is the duty to urge our legislators in Washington and in State capitols to immediate action.

SENATOR WALSH'S BILL

"To us Senator WALSH'S bill appears to afford the needed remedy. It provides for a commission to whom contracts between competing interests may be voluntarily submitted; that such interests may, within well-defined limitations, enter into contracts for the appointment of production and the regulation of price, provided the proposed agreement, with a statement of reasons therefor, be first filed with the commission; that the proposed contract shall be assumed to be in the public interest if it results in a fair wage to labor and fair compensation to producers of average ability and efficiency; and that no person a party to such contract may increase the price beyond the fair and reasonable profit fixed therein. Each industry has the responsibility of producing the facts relating to its own line of endeavor.

"During the year that this bill has been pending tens of millions have been expended in a vain endeavor to cure the evils of unemployment, but without going to the cause of the unemployment. The millions of workers out of employment have increased; the peril to the spiritual as well as to the material side of our national life has intensified, and the dollar of disbursement which was found in 1928 in the manufacturing industries pay roll of the United States has dropped to 36 cents in September of 1932."

Federal Trade Commission

Professor Tompkins then proceeded to explain the proposed enlargement of the Federal Trade Commission and its extension of powers, saying:

"The bill enlarges the present Federal Trade Commission from 5 members to 9, not more than 5 to be from the same political party, provides for appointment by the President, fixes salaries at $10,000 a year, and gives the commission wide and discretionary powers.

"It is very obvious that if the new Federal Trade Commissioners be men of wide understanding with broad progressive ideas of social service, the agreements brought back in each industry for renewal and extension from time to time could be progressively made to include all worthwhile matters of social service, such as old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, health insurance, and various matters of working-condition improvement, as well as shorter working week, a shorter working day. The time may have come when the production week should be a shorter week in order to prevent our productive output from running away again from our consumptive capacity.

"Structures and buildings

"Beyond these benefits to ensue, the adoption of the principles contained in the Walsh bill will have the effect of increasing the present values of structures and buildings now existing which were erected under the old basis of cost. Take, for instance, any large building today; if it were erected at the 1925 to 1930 levels, and had to compete directly with a duplicate building erected today, the value of the old building would have to be depreciated perhaps 40 to 45 percent. But if it were established that the new building to be erected shall include within its cost a fair compensation to all concerned and bring into effect the essentials of social service, which must gradually be funded upward to eliminate Federal and State unemployment relief, and perhaps aged relief in the future, the cost of the new building would come close to the cost value of the older building, and the present investments of our banks, insurance companies, and individuals would be preserved."

Picturing the growth of public thought upon this particular phase of proposed constructive legislation, Professor Tompkins pointed out:

"While the subject is new in the matter of time, public opinion is in the making upon it. Individuals, trade organizations, labor organizations, and leaders of thought have been loud in their demands. The press as exemplified by the papers controlled by Mr. Hearst, Colliers, and other newspapers and magazines, have been busy these past few months with editorial comment and special articles, and all without exception have endorsed the principles embodied in the Walsh bill."

And Professor Tompkins closed one of the most worth-while Radio Forum hours ever presented in this country by saying:

"It is hard to imagine a greater public service that could be performed now than bringing into immediate operation the legislative principles available to us in Senator WALSH'S bill. With these principles in force, we confidently believe that the President will supplement them with the appointment of commissioners who will give real, long-sighted, clear-visioned service to the future of the country, and thus bring prosperity to industry and labor."

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this country and its Government must be freed from the strangle hold of the usurping ring of international banksters. This gang of usurping mammonites is gaining more of a strangle hold upon the new administration than it held upon the past administration. The public are fast losing confidence. Confidence will not be restored by further continuing in power this gang control over the finances of this Nation.

The people of this country want to know the condition of the United States Treasury and whether the gold and the trust funds are intact, and what the liabilities of the United States are. The people have a right to know this. If we pass laws for publicity on issues of railroad, industrial, public utility, and foreign issues of securities, should not the United States furnish the investors and the stockholders of the United States auditors' reports as to the assets and liabilities of the United States? Until this information is furnished the investing public no more Government bonds should be sold by this Government.

Are we going to pay the inevitable price of proving our imbecility, or are we going to exercise the rights of the people who sent us here to whom only we are responsible?

I am calling your attention to House Concurrent Resolution No. 12, now pending before the Committee on Rules, which calls for the appointment of five Members each from the House and Senate to make an audit of the assets and liabilities of the United States Treasury. This resolution reads as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there is hereby established a special joint congressional committee (hereinafter in this resolution referred to as the committee) to be composed of five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Upon the termination of the present Congress the committee shall cease to exist.

SEC. 2. The committee is authorized and directed to investigate and make an audit of the operations of the Treasury Department in the collection, investment, and disbursement of public moneys, and of moneys derived in whole or in part from sources other than taxation, and to report to the Senate and the House of Representatives, as soon as practicable, but not later than the termination of the present Congress, the results of its investigation, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to select a chairman, to sit and act during the present Congress at such times, whether or not the Congress, or either House thereof, is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to employ such experts and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures (not exceeding $250,000), as it deems necessary. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman, and shall be served by any person designated by him. The provisions of sections 101, 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 2, secs. 191, 192, 193, and 194) shall be applicable in respect of any person summoned as a witness, in the same manner as such provisions are applicable in respect of any person summoned as a witness in the case of an inquiry before a committee of the House of Representatives.

May I say to the responsible leadership in this House that the promise made by your then leader and the Republican leadership at the last session of Congress, that an audit of the Treasury should be made, should now be fulfilled by the passage of this resolution. A like promise for an investigation of the Federal Reserve Board and Federal Reserve banks should also now be fulfilled by the passage of House Resolution No. 20, which is also before the Rules Committee. This resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That for the purpose of obtaining information necessary as a basis of legislation, the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the Federal Reserve Board of the Federal Reserve banks, and such member banks of the Federal Reserve System as may be necessary, in their activities with respect to foreign banks and foreign central banks, their open-market operations and acceptance business, and their connection with the American Acceptance Council, and their collaboration with other banks (American and foreign) in the operations of such banks in foreign financing; and for the purpose of this investigation the committee may make such audit of the books of the Federal Reserve Board, Federal Reserve banks, and member banks of the Federal Reserve System as it deems necessary.

SEC. 2. Such committee shall, as soon as practicable, report the results of its investigation to the House, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable. For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the United States or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and affirmations, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, as it deems necessary.

This was promised at the last session of Congress. Are you going to fulfill that promise? The people of this country want to know.

May I call your attention to the fact that a little over a month ago the Federal Reserve System completely broke down; all the banks in the United States were closed; thousands of the banks are still closed, and hundreds of millions of dollars of assets belonging to the people of the United States are tied up because of the failure of this banking system.

On behalf of the people that I represent in Congress and the other people of this Nation, I demand a complete investigation of the operations of this System. It is time that our assets and liabilities are counted and reported. This is particularly true when, by Executive order, demands are made that all of the gold held by the people of the United States be deposited in this private banking system, the Federal Reserve banks. May I again say to you, who have the responsibility, that you will not restore confidence until these two things are done. And unless immediate action is taken, it may be too late. This private banking system, the Federal Reserve, and the Treasury of the United States are completely controlled and dominated by this gang of banksters which we designate as international. [Applause.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been here a long time and understands the orderly procedure of the House. I presume one of the resolutions he refers to is his. If he has any information, why does he not go to the Committee on Rules and give the legislative committee the information without trying to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery when we have a man in the White House who is trying to restore confidence and is restoring confidence?

Mr. McFADDEN. There is plenty of information before the Committee on Rules to report out both resolutions. I am ready to go before the Committee on Rules and present more evidence. Look at my statements and other statements before the Rules Committee printed in the hearings.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD in my remarks the resolutions I have referred to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the delegate from Puerto Rico may address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

PAN AMERICAN DAY

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, as the representative from Puerto Rico, I have been asked to say a few words on this day, April 14, to greet the peoples and the governments of our sister republics of Latin America from the floor of this Chamber, on the occasion of the commemoration of the annual anniversary of the Pan American Day.

His excellency the President of the United States has already delivered a magnificent address at the Pan American Union, expressing his fraternal and sincere good will for peace, progress, and prosperity before the representatives of the 20 Latin American Republics. His address was certainly inspired by the greatest principles of justice, best understanding, and amity toward all the Spanish-speaking countries south of the Rio Grande.

The President and the citizens of the United States firmly believe in the principle of freedom and self-determination for nations. It is high time to reach some definite understanding as to the distinction between intervention and mutual protection. The President has been very clear in his address dedicated to Pan America in clarifying the policies of mutual understanding in the Latin American sphere. An alternative course to arbitration is a conference of Pan American countries that are engaged in fighting each other and to agree upon new methods and agencies for deciding international relations and business.

I have the honor to be the secretary of the Pan American Federation of Labor. In this capacity I have become familiar with President William Green's position that disputes arising between nations which do not involve honor or sovereignty should be referred to arbitration tribunals for settlement.

Of course, the United States, with the rest of the Pan American Republics, have already cooperated to prevent war and dealt constructively with the causes which create war. Peace cannot be maintained by merely wishing for peace. A remedy must be found for the causes which create war and a basis of accommodation devised by which disputes and disagreements which arise between nations may be fairly and equitably settled. American labor also joins hands with the President of the United States in hoping that our Government will never play the part of an imperialist autocrat in its relations with the peoples of Latin American countries, but will prove itself to be, by practice and precept, an advocate and a proponent of the best ideals of mutual protection and democratic freedom.

I am profoundly convinced that whatever the President can do to increase the spiritual ties of good will and the material prosperity and happiness of all the good peoples of the Americas will promote human welfare.

The President's purpose seems to me is to bring those peoples together so that they may be neighbors in peace and the best of understandings—mutually tolerant, sympathetic, and truthful. The more the world knows about how these things are brought about, the better it will be. It is my hope that in the near future there may be striking developments in this direction for the benefit of both the peoples of Latin America and the United States. [Applause.]

GOOD-WILL REPRESENTATION

As a Representative of the people of Puerto Rico, which stands primarily for human rights and human welfare, I desire to bring to your consideration the advisability of having on some of the Pan American commissions that have to do with matters that will so affect the future development of the peoples of America men who represent directly the great producing masses of the citizens of our Nation; men who know the human problems, social and economic difficulties and their ideals, and who are able to understand and comprehend these problems with which the producing masses of other countries have to deal, and who, therefore, are best fitted to cooperate in the formulating of policies and recommendations calculated to promote the development and the betterment of the lives of the peoples of all of the American countries.

Our President may in the future extend to the governments of all Americans an invitation to attend a Pan American conference in Washington with a view to establish closer and more satisfactory relations between their countries and the United States of America.

Expansion of trade and commerce, whether in Latin America or in any other part of the earth, is of vital importance to the American producers and industrial workers eveywhere, because it will give stability to industry in this country and assure steadier and increasing employment. Such a result will undoubtedly contribute to the welfare of all peoples, not only those of the producing masses but of every class, because the more widely diffused prosperity is the greater will be the benefit to all the people, regardless of class or condition. The President's hope is that we may all pull together without partisan bias in a lofty spirit of fraternity and with a noble purpose to advance human rights, promote human welfare, agree upon those measures and methods of the President, and do those things which are essential to the advancement of these great objects.

In this movement, which aims to strengthen the ties of the United States and the Latin Americas in the worthy journey toward the final goal of the continental weal, history has already designated the advanced guard. Geographically, this advanced guard is Puerto Rico, the community I represent, the one spot in this hemisphere where two great peoples and two mighty civilizations are bent to the task of creating the composite mentality of a new, understanding America.

Perhaps I am wrong in my views and perhaps you may think that I have engaged in generalities in what I have said. I have not meant to generalize, but to be as specific as possible in setting out the general principles that are guiding my own thought and convictions so far as I have been able to express them in the brief compass of my remarks.

The schools and colleges promoted and fostered by the Pan American Union have had a very large part in bringing the people of the Americas together, particularly those of the United States, for while certain outstanding Latin American institutions have attracted many students from the other countries, vastly larger numbers have come to the United States. The reports of the Pan American Union say that thousands of Latin American teachers, engineers, doctors, nurses, agricultural experts, scientists, and business men who received their training in American colleges are serving as a link between the United States and their own countries. They keep up their contacts by reading American books and magazines, and returning to the United States from time to time, and frequently interest their friends in coming here. Many of them have become prominent in public life and so have been the means of promoting closer relationships.

Among the Latin American countries university professors are often invited to lecture for a longer or shorter period at some other Latin American university. Although because of the difference in language this practice is less common between the universities of the United States and of Latin America, every year sees a number of prominent professors from American universities visiting and lecturing in Latin America, and vice versa. In many instances honorary degrees have been conferred on visiting professors and scientists.

The working people in the Pan American countries should be guaranteed the right to organize and to cooperate within their respective countries in the furtherance of their legitimate, social, industrial, and economic interests. The right of free speech, free assemblage, and free press should not be abridged. Liberty, democracy, and justice should triumph over autocracy and unfreedom in any form. [Applause.]

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD in full a resolution recently adopted by the American Legion of Bergen County, N.J. The Members of the House should be interested in this resolution, commending as it does the work of this Congress and the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following:

As members of the American Legion, an organization which in its first essence is dedicated to the causes of Americanism; and

Whereas we are cognizant of the grave plight in which many of our citizens have been placed because of current economic conditions brought on and aggravated, at least in part, by unrestrained spending of Federal, State, and municipal incomes; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States has delegated to our President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, upon his request, extraordinary powers and responsibilities to cope with the existing national emergency; and

Whereas we have full confidence that he will exercise these powers and responsibilities courageously, wisely, and fairly; and

Whereas it is to the interest of all citizens of the United States to assist in making possible the fulfillment of the proposals on which the President is now working: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion of Bergen County, Department of New Jersey, in a regular meeting assembled March 28, 1933, in Rutherford, N.J., do hereby unanimously express our great confidence in the courage, fairness, and wisdom of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and we do hereby pledge ourselves to fully support his expressed policies of reducing all Government expenditures in a just and fair manner; and be it

Further resolved, That the county organization does hereby express to the President and to the Congress its admiration for their unselfish devotion to the interest of the people, for their utter disregard of political expediency, and for the setting of this example, which the States and municipalities may well follow; and be it

Further resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to our Congressmen for presentation to President Roosevelt, and that a copy be sent to the American Legion, Department of New Jersey.

THE AMERICAN LEGION OF BERGEN COUNTY, N.J., CHARLES MASTENBROOK, Commander.

Attest:

VICTOR A. SPACE, Adjutant.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS AND MUNITIONS OF WAR

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time under the rule for the consideration of the embargo bill be extended 1 hour, the additional hour to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee and myself. I have consulted the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and he has no objection to this request. We have nothing to do today but consider this bill, and I hope no objection will be raised.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this resolution for the reason that it is a step leading the United States farther into European affairs.

Its advocates in the United States are principally that class of people who are known as "internationalists." We find among the advocates of this proposed legislation all of the pacifists' organizations in the United States. I may mention also the American Foreign Policy Association, the League for Peace and Freedom, and the Academy of Political and Social Science, whose purposes were clearly disclosed the other evening in New York by that famous British propagandist, George Bernard Shaw. He said that the purpose of this particular organization, under whose auspices he was speaking, is to destroy the Constitution of the United States. This organization is endorsing the passage of this particular piece of legislation. The Carnegie Foundation and affiliated foundations, with resources running into the hundreds of millions of dollars, are in favor of the passage of this resolution because it further ties us up with international affairs.

This particular piece of legislation was presented to the Congress by the last administration at the request of Great Britain. I want to make it perfectly clear to the Members here that this legislation is here at the instance of Europe. It is un-American. It takes from our control further determinations with regard to the management of our own affairs.

I would say that this Congress, to protect the President of the United States, should refuse to pass this legislation. The President of the United States is being besieged by the foreigners to come to their rescue, and I believe it would be right and proper that Congress should withhold this legislation from him lest he be tempted under this great influence of Europe which is being exercised at this time to do, under this authority, something which should not be done. I am fearful that, inasmuch as the President of the United States has accepted in toto the policy of the previous administration as regards foreign affairs and affairs in the Far East, if this legislation should be given to him and he is driven to the point of exercising this right as regards the declaration of an embargo on the shipment of arms to Japan, within 30 days after he exercised such right we would witness a declaration of war on the part of Japan against the United States.

The foreign policy of Secretary Stimson, acquiesced in by the former administration, in the minds of a great majority of the American people is a wrong policy, a meddling policy, and one that is causing extreme embarrassment to the United States at this time. I do not think, however, that Japan is the real reason this legislation is asked for. I believe it is purely a European situation where the countries of Europe today are seething with trouble, where the great masses of people over there are preparing for war, where they are equipped as they were not equipped for war in 1914, and they are looking at each other's throats, because they fear this great spread of bolshevism and strife between France and Italy and Germany. This is why they are asking for this embargo. Every one of the major countries in Europe is trying to get the support of the United States on its side.

I think we should stop, look, and listen before we go forward with such legislation and enact it into law. The condition of this country today is largely due to the influences from abroad which have trickled in here. We are now about to witness another conference, which is in preparation for a still greater conference in London, and I may point out in this connection that this is only a part of the whole program. The entire program is all laid. This was planned in July 1931, when a conference was held in London in connection with the Hoover moratorium, where we were officially represented by Henry L. Stimson and Andrew W. Mellon. This conference dealt with debts; it laid down a plan for cancelation of reparations; it laid down plans for an economic conference, which is about to be held, and we are going to send representatives over there to deal in the vital things which pertain to the welfare of the people of the United States.

I am against it. I am against the meddling by Europeans in the affairs of this country. I wonder how long the House of Representatives is going to sit idly by and let Europe run the affairs of this country. When you enact legislation like this, you are simply inviting further machinations by these foreigners who are holding down affairs in this country.

You have right now international control of exchanges by Great Britain, which is holding down price levels in our country. They are speculating in exchange; they are speculating in the dollar; and only yesterday they lowered the price of the dollar in all markets of the world through manipulation by the British Government of its great stabilization fund, which is tending to strangle industry in the United States and force us to our knees and to a cancelation of debts.

Why is Premier MacDonald coming here next week? He said in press reports yesterday that he was coming here to discuss war debts. Mr. Speaker, I want to point out in this connection, what we all know, that there is no authority for the administration to deal with the debt situation. This power is solely with the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States.

Are we going to permit still further meddling in our own affairs by the passage of a bill like this? I say no. It would be well before the Congress acts on this particular resolution to have before the appropriate committee of this House the real reasons for the legislation. Call the Secretary of State himself; call the previous Secretary of State; and let them tell you the real facts that are behind this situation.

Only 10 days ago we passed a resolution here that we knew nothing about. We know less about the real purposes of this proposed law than we did of that resolution.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am thankful that the Senate of the United States has remodeled that particular piece of legislation, but I say, shame on the Congress of the United States when it considers legislation of that nature which comes to us without knowing what it is. I say to you that there is an undisclosed reason for this particular piece of legislation. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Can the gentleman inform us whether this resolution is a part of the President's program?

Mr. McFADDEN. All I know about the inception of this resolution is that it is of British origin. It was first introduced at the instance of the British Ambassador to the United States, and I recall that a day or two before this particular resolution was presented to this Congress there were conferences between the British Ambassador, the State Department, and the White House.

Mr. MOTT. Can the gentleman tell us whether the President is in favor of this resolution?

Mr. McFADDEN. I cannot speak for the President.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution, like much modern legislation, when considered, has a red herring drawn across its trail. Everyone who rises to speak and say a word against the resolution is falsely accused of jingoism. There is no one who is a right-thinking person who does not clamor for peace. Americans instinctively clamor for peace. Here is the real question involved in this piece of legislation as I see it. It is whether or not it is a wise policy to leave exclusively in the hands of the President the great foreign policy of when we are going to levy an embargo against the shipment of arms, and when we are not, and to what countries we are going to permit arms to be sold, and to which countries we are not.

For centuries mankind struggled for the people through their representatives to have the exclusive right to declare war. So long as it was within the power of the executives to declare war, the people were constantly at war. When the fathers wrote the Constitution of this country they were very careful to make the provision that only the people, through their representatives, could declare war. The Constitution even takes that entirely out of the hands of the President, and please understand me, when I say "the President", I am not talking about President Franklin D. Roosevelt, but I am talking about any President, whoever he may be, now or in the future. Article I of the Constitution designates the powers delegated to the Congress, and section 8 of article I sets forth some of the things which Congress has the power to do. Among other things is the right to declare war. The power vested in the hands of one man to bring about that condition which means war amounts to placing the power in the hands of one man to declare war.

I am not in favor of this country profiteering by shipping arms into another country to carry on warfare against some other country. I believe that any time this President or any future President deems it advisable that this country should not ship arms to any given country, all he has to do is to come to the Congress and ask that an embargo be laid against the shipment of arms into such other country. Bringing it down to a concrete case in past experience, I have no doubt that but at any time from 1914 until the day we entered the war, if President Wilson had deemed it advisable that this country should not ship arms to the Allies, he could have come before the Congress and asked for an embargo prohibiting the shipment of arms to the Allies, and it would have been granted. Likewise, if he had deemed it advisable not to ship arms to Germany, it would also have been granted. The question involved in this legislation is whether or not we are going to place the power in the hands of the President to do that which leads inevitably to war.

This resolution when it is enacted into law is permanent legislation. I asked my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. POU], when he made the statement that he had explicit confidence in the present President—that he would not abuse the power and lead the country into war—whether he thought the present President would be President forever. He replied that he thought and hoped he would be for 8 years. That is all right. That is not a great problem; it is not a matter which worries me a great deal, whether Franklin D. Roosevelt is going to be President 4 years or 8 years. So far as this resolution is concerned, I know that we are passing permanent legislation, and I know that we are placing the power in the hands of the President now and in the future whereby he can take sides as between countries engaged in war, and possibly take sides with a country contrary to the general public opinion in this country, and lead this country directly into war.

Take the case of Japan and China, who are now at war. Assuming the President declares an embargo against this country shipping munitions of war to Japan, but permits them to be shipped to China; you know and I know that that means that this country will be at war with Japan in a very short time. Or put it around the other way, assume that he should declare that we should not ship munitions of war to China but could to Japan, that would mean that we would be at war in a very short time with China. Whenever something is going to be done which leads directly and inevitably to war, I want the representatives of the American people in Congress to bear that responsibility; and if you and I in this Congress do not want to bear that responsibility, we should not sit here and enact legislation which would make it impossible for some future Congress to bear that responsibility.

I cannot see any immediate need to place this power in the hands of Mr. Roosevelt. It is inconceivable to me that he cannot come to this Congress and obtain an embargo against shipping arms into any country. Three fourths of the Members of this House are Democrats and two thirds of the Members of the Senate are Democrats. Furthermore, Republican Members of Congress have demonstrated, time without number, that they will go along with a Democratic President on a war policy. Therefore, I cannot see how Franklin D. Roosevelt can be embarrassed by leaving this power in the Congress where it was placed by the framers of the Constitution. However, if he is insistent that he needs this power exclusively in his hands, I would not seriously object to this legislation if it were limited to 4 years. I think that by temperament President Roosevelt is a man of peace. I do not think he would willfully do something that would lead us to war. I am not so sure as to the temperaments of future Presidents. The attitude of a President in international affairs is largely a matter of personal temperament.

In many respects I revere the great Theodore Roosevelt. However, if he were living and were President, I think by temperament it would be exceedingly difficult for him to refrain from taking sides in any war that might spring up some place in the world. I doubt if he could refrain from using the power vested in the President by this bill to send munitions to the country whose side he was taking in the conflict. Unquestionably that would lead to war. If this country takes sides in wars between other countries, I want the people of this country, with their public opinion reflected through their representatives, to pick the country they are going to favor, and not leave it to one man to make that choice. I want that choice made by public sentiment here in the United States, and not through some conference of other nations or through the President's participating in such conference. I choose to follow the policy of Washington in keeping out of foreign entanglements. Whenever we deviate from that policy and we do become entangled in the controversies of other countries, I want it to be the people of the United States, through their representatives, who make the entanglement, and not one man in the White House, whoever he may be.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to my distinguished colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BAKEWELL].

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I rise to oppose House Joint Resolution 93 in the name of peace. We can take it for granted we are all as good Americans, inveterate lovers of peace, that we know that war is a hideous and altogether senseless way of settling disputes between nations. We shudder at the mere thought of the possibility of another world war, which should it befall, would probably spell the end of our civilization, with dark ages looming ahead.

We know that even if we should not be involved directly in the conflict we should inevitably go down in the resulting desolations. So we have always favored all peaceful measures to outlaw war. We have initiated many, and supported all proposals for the reduction of armaments, and for the multiplication of the means of bringing about amicable settlements of disputes between nations. But our very zeal in the cause of universal peace makes us only too prone to grasp at every proposal which at first sight looks big with promise, without stopping to analyze it, and to ask whether it may not bring upon us the very evils it is designed to prevent.

Such a proposal is the one embodied in the measure now before us. Introduced to further the cause of peace, it will, in fact, incite to war. Our President during his campaign, and he is, as you know, a very facile and clever artificer of phrases, when he was making promises that seemed inconsistent with each other and was called upon to explain how these things were to be carried out, used to waive aside the objection by saying: "You must not confuse objective with method." This is a great phrase. Now, we are all in agreement with regard to the objective of the measure before us, namely, placing the full strength and power of America in the service in the interest of peace. What we differ about is the method. We remember that when we entered the World War we were told it was a war to put an end to war, and many of us fondly believed it. Then came the great disillusionment, when the war was over, which should have taught us once for all that we may not, by war or by warlike methods, serve the cause of peace.

Let there be no misunderstanding about the measure now before us. It gives the President absolute authority in case of any conflict to pick the aggressor nation and proceed against it. To pick the aggressor and act against it is a hostile and unneutral act that invites reprisals which may easily plunge us into war.

I know it is said by the supporters of this bill that the President would do no such thing; that he would move with caution; that he would make no mistakes. It seems to be the prevailing opinion, at least for the time being, of the Members on the left that, as the old saying goes, "the king can do no wrong"—the President cannot err; or, as the young Fascists in Italy are taught to affirm as part of their creed, "Mussolini is always right." This is a dangerous position for us to take. I do not want to be misunderstood. There is no one in this House on either side of the aisle who for a moment would question our President's loyalty and patriotism or his single-minded devotion to the welfare of the country. We have all welcomed his energy and swiftness of action. For my part I have gladly supported and shall continue to support the President's constructive measures—all of them; that is to say, that do not, in my judgment, threaten worse evils than those they are introduced to remove, or threaten to intensify the existing evils.

What we object to—and I think rightly—is the prevailing assumption, as indicated in the rules you have adopted, that all the bills which come from the other end of the Avenue have in some way sprung, like Minerva, complete and perfect, from the very head of Jove himself; and we are not allowed to make any changes, to add or take away a word from the sacred text.

The President himself has left us in no doubt as to his purpose should this bill be passed. He has openly expressed himself as in favor of taking action against an aggressor nation, and that is an unneutral, a hostile act, an act of war and not of peace.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. Is the gentleman speaking for the President in this respect?

Mr. BAKEWELL. Just what does the gentleman mean?

Mr. BLOOM. The statement the gentleman just made. In making this statement is he speaking for the President?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I am quoting a statement of the President's which appeared in all the newspapers.

Mr. BLOOM. But the gentleman has not taken that up with the President?

Mr. BAKEWELL. It has never been denied.

Mr. BLOOM. As far as I am concerned it has never been approved.

Mr. BAKEWELL. The statement was attributed to the President, and was printed with quotation marks, as being his own words. If the President did not stand for it he should have denied it.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman is not speaking for the President, is he?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I am quoting from the papers and from a speech reported as having been made by the President.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman does not want to say it is a speech, does he?

Mr. BAKEWELL. Well, a statement, if you please. According to the papers he said, "I have always been in favor", and so forth. That is the way the statement began. Now, of course, if he was misquoted he should have corrected it.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. For a brief question.

Mr. MOTT. Has the gentleman information as to whether this resolution is a part of the President's program?

Mr. BAKEWELL. We have been so informed.

Mr. FISH. Should not this question be addressed to the Democratic side of the House?

Mr. MOTT. If I am unable to get an answer from any Republican I shall ask the question of the Democratic speakers, because I should like to know. I should like to know whether this is a part of the administration program to the same extent that the press gag passed by the House, but later repudiated by the administration, as not part of its program.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I am sorry, but I cannot yield further. I may say to the gentleman from New York that if this is not the President's purpose, the joint resolution should be so changed as to make such action impossible. The joint resolution, as it reads, gives the President full authority to do just this thing, to pick the aggressor nation and proceed against it.

Furthermore, it puts in advance the seal of congressional approval upon any action he may take. In other words, it is one more abdication of power on the part of Congress, one more instance of the surrender of its rights and the shirking of its responsibilities; for the Constitution lays upon Congress, and upon Congress alone, sole responsibility for making war.

It is notoriously difficult, even with the calm judgment that comes in the perspective of time, to pick, in a given war, the aggressor nation. The right is rarely, if ever, all on one side, the wrong all on the other. It is true that by the Treaty of Versailles Germany was forced on her knees to accept full guilt for the World War. No German believed that. And who knows to what extent resentment over that forced admission is responsible for the rise of Hitlerism in Germany and for the rattling of the saber which is now heard on the farther side of the Rhine.

In modern times no nation engaged in war admits that it is the aggressor. How then can we sit in judgment and declare anyone to be the aggressor without arousing lasting and menacing enmity? It is hard enough even for individuals to meet in mutual understanding; harder still for great sections of our country, whose interests are diverse, to see eye to eye; hard, as we know, for the agricultural West to place itself at the angle of vision of the industrial East, and for the industrial East to see with the eyes of the agricultural West. But as between nations it is all but impossible to reach such mutual understanding.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. THOM. In the recent consideration of the Japanese-Chinese situation, how many nations voted Japan the wrongdoer?

Mr. BAKEWELL. It is impossible to answer that question without going into considerable discussion as to political complications that developed with the smaller powers in Europe with respect to their private interests; and if we were to take that up it would consume all my time. I should like to discuss that matter with the gentleman if I had the time.

Mr. THOM. Is it not true that all of the nations joined in the condemnation of Japan; and my recollection is that one nation did not vote, and that was Siam.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Of course, that makes no difference whatever.

Mr. THOM. That meets the gentleman's argument that there can be no universal judgment with respect to any one nation.

Mr. BAKEWELL. That does not make it universal. Furthermore, as anyone can see who will look into the history of that discussion, political questions entered in; and these little nations were protecting themselves, and they thought that by punishing Japan they would be establishing their own positions more securely. But that is aside from the point. It may be said, however, as you are saying, that there is in existence a body which can pick the aggressor, that the League of Nations has, in fact, declared Japan the aggressor in the conflict with China, and all we have to do is to follow that lead. It is evident that this would merely mean that we should be virtually joining the League of Nations, and precisely in that part of it which is most repugnant to the American people, namely, the enforcement of the war sanctions of articles X and XVI of the Covenant. It was because of objections to these sections that we refused to go into the League.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BAKEWELL. For a question only, and not for any argument, because I have not the time.

Mr. THOM. If it is the universal verdict of the nations of the world that one country is the aggressor, and if it is the universal verdict of those nations to apply an embargo on arms, what would the gentleman have the United States do?

Mr. BAKEWELL. Keep out of it entirely. [Applause.] It is enough that the one nation against whom this is directed is sure that it is not the aggressor, and would be declared by such action the aggressor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIROVICH). The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. BAKEWELL. In any event, it is certain that if we should, whether alone or conjointly with the League, declare one nation the aggressor, and lay an embargo against it, we should be committing a hostile and an unneutral act, an act of war and not of peace.

The recognized authorities on international law are in agreement on this point. If you will read the statement made by Professor Borchard and by Mr. Moore, recognized the world over as the leading authority on international law, you will have no doubt as to the real significance and the hidden menace of the proposal before us. The menace is clear, and what are the gains to be expected?

It is admitted on all sides that to prevent the export of arms and munitions of war would be altogether futile unless all the important munition-making countries joined in the embargo. It is, however, rarely recognized how small and insignificant a part is played in most cases by the actual shipment of munitions to a nation at war.

Let me illustrate by the case of Japan, and give a few figures. Last year the total value of the exports of the United States in arms and munitions amounted to $1,700,000. Of this shipment a negligible amount went to Japan. But during the same year Japan purchased from us $100,000,000 worth of the makings of munitions.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I have not the time.

Of the 46,000,000 pounds of lead that we exported, 40,000,000, or 90 percent, went to Japan alone. Does anyone suppose that this was for the purpose of putting a new plumbing system in the palace of the Emperor? The destination of that lead was bullets. During the same year Japan was our greatest purchaser of cotton, buying nearly a million more bales than were purchased by Great Britain, although she has less than one sixth as many spindles.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 more minutes.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Is it not clear that the destination of that surplus cotton was dynamite, gunpowder, nitroglycerin, TNT, and other explosives for use in war? Furthermore, an important factor for a nation at war is the maintenance of the sinews of war; that is, cash and credits. This Japan has been doing by inundating America with goods manufactured in long hours of labor, at low wages, and those paid in a greatly depreciated currency. If we really wish the purpose of this bill to be accomplished, we should cut off all traffic relations with the aggressor nation.

If all nations should join in such procedure, the result would no doubt be effective, although still a violation of neutrality. The only way to avoid such violation would be to cut off all traffic relations with both belligerents. This would, indeed, be equal in law, but unfortunately not in fact, for it would, in effect, be favoring the strong and well-prepared nation at the expense of the weak. So whichever way we turn there is trouble ahead.

America's greatest power for peace comes from her strict neutrality and from her refusal to sit in judgment on the disputes of other nations. Let us not lightly surrender this power only to set our feet on the pathway that leads to hatred and to war. The strength of the Kellogg pact lay precisely in the fact that it had no teeth.

If war is to be prevented, it is by the encouragement of the will to peace, and this can come only through the cultivation of mutual understanding. It is with nations as with individuals. If they meet in understanding, the result is friendship and peace. If they meet with suspicion and distrust, the result is fear; the end of fear is hate and the end of hate is war. Let us rather follow the advice of Washington, given in his immortal address:

> Preserve good faith and justice toward all nations, cultivate peace and harmony with all. * * * It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant period a great nation to give mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence.

This was and is and always will be the only sure pathway to permanent peace.

[Excerpts from statement by Professor Borchard]

But in either case the permission or prohibition must, in order to be defensible in international law, apply to all the countries at war, and not to some of them. Impartiality is the keynote of neutrality (Oppenheim, 4th ed. 563). If some only could be selected either for the permission or prohibition, neutrality would at once be violated and the country discriminated against would have a legitimate casus belli. The discrimination is an unfriendly and hostile act of greatest significance, and against a strong power might very readily be a prelude to war. It is, indeed, a warlike act, if not itself an act of war. It is as dangerous as the boycott which some Americans urged against Japan in the spring of 1932, but which Congress and the country wisely rejected. It is in fact a boycott of a special kind. It can, moreover, hardly be applied by governmental action without breach of the usual commercial treaty, if any, concluded with the country against which it is applied.

The President is thus given the power to make an alliance and a treaty for hostile action against a third state or states, without consultation with, and hence without the consent of, Congress. Such power, even in time of war, was refused to the last Democratic President. Now, in time of peace, without any restrictions or limitations, it is proposed to confer it upon the occupant of the Presidential office.

As already observed, the resolution contemplates a hostile act which empowers the President to breach our commercial treaties, violate and impair the neutrality of the United States—perhaps its most valuable asset and safeguard—and take a step which every self-respecting belligerent would probably regard as a casus belli. It amounts to a declaration of war against the country singled out for the application of the embargo.

It is said, however, in the official memorandum submitted in its support that the existing embargo power, in cases of domestic violence on the American continent and in China, has been employed "with great effect and negligible friction." One may respectfully venture to doubt this conclusion. As in the case of Brazil in 1930, the embargo was employed against the revolutionary party who the next day took over the seat of government. The unneutral act involved produced serious criticism. Contrary to a common assumption, there is no duty upon the United States to stop a revolution abroad any more than it was the duty of Russia or Spain to stop the American Revolution. To undertake such a function, indeed, is a breach of neutrality, and hence illegal as a matter of international law. It involves intervention in the affairs of a foreign country and has already incurred for the United States distrust on the American Continent. It enables the administration to play favorites abroad, interfere when it should not interfere, and thus forfeit that impartiality and neutrality which is the keystone of foreign respect. The interfering partisan often invites and enlists the hatred and contempt of both sides, and experience might indicate that the Government is as likely to be mistaken as it is to be correct in estimating the merits of a foreign controversy, even if such judgments were possible and even if it were deemed an American duty to be a judge.

It seems strange that Senators who were not willing to have the United States join the League of Nations, where the United States would be but one of many powers and where action under article 16 could be taken only by unanimity, should be willing to permit the President, on his own unreviewable election, to join with one or more powers of the League to do that which article 16 safeguards by the requirement of unanimity.

[Excerpts from statement of Mr. George Bassett Moore]

It will soon be 20 years since the outbreak in Europe of what eventually became known as the "World War." Following that unfortunate event there developed, in the ordinary course of things, a war madness, manifested in the exaltation of force, and the belittling of the enduring legal and moral obligations which lie at the foundation of civilized life. Peaceful processes fell into disrepute. We began to hear of the "war to end war"; and pacifists, enamored of this shibboleth, espoused the shallow creed that international peace could best be assured by the use of force or threats of force. We were told that preexisting international law had suddenly become obsolete, and that the world had entered upon a new era in which the general tranquillity was to be maintained by "sanctions", by boycotts, and by war. But the final stage was reached in the spawning of the notion, now rampant, that peoples may with force and arms exterminate one another without breach of the peace, so long as they do not call it war. This may appropriately be called the stage of bedlam. In all this, however, students of history will find nothing new. The development of such manias normally characterizes the progress of a great war, just as their decline marks the return to sanity.

To the final stage to which I have referred belongs the supposition that the law of neutrality no longer exists, and that in future there will be no more neutrals. It is on this theory that the proposed resolution is essentially based. It is true that the resolution does not in terms say so; and it is equally true that less is just now said about this phase of the subject than was said not long ago. But it is only on this theory that the sweeping terms of the resolution can be defended.

As a lifelong student and administrator of international law, I do not hesitate to declare the supposition that neutrality is a thing of the past to be unsound in theory and false in fact. There is not in the world today a single government that is acting upon such a supposition.

From the elementary principles of international law above set forth it necessarily follows that, if a government bans the shipment of arms and munitions of war to one of the parties to an armed conflict and permits it to the other, it intervenes in the conflict in a military sense and makes itself a party to the war, whether declared or undeclared.

The pending resolution is, I do not hesitate to affirm, opposed to the settled policy and the highest interests of the United States and also to the provisions of our Federal Constitution. If adopted, it would enable the President (1) to make international engagements of the most far-reaching kind at his will, without the advice and consent of the Senate, and (2) to carry us into war without the prerequisite constitutional declaration of war by Congress. Perhaps it may be answered that by the proposed resolution the Senate would voluntarily abdicate its constitutional powers regarding international engagements, and that the Congress would likewise abdicate its constitutional powers regarding the declaration of war. This argument might be accepted if the Senate and the Congress could constitutionally divest themselves of their constitutional powers and commit everything to the Executive. But, as they were unwilling to do this during the so-called "World War", when it was proposed to give the President complete dictatorial powers, I can only suppose that the present extraordinary agitation is due to the misleading and somewhat deafening clamor of those who, in the name of peace, would confer upon the President an unlimited right to engage in hostilities. I refrain from saying an unlimited right to make war only out of deference to the profound and learned authorities who assure us that war can be abolished either by calling it peace or by refraining from calling it war. This is, I may remark, a favorite notion with those who demand that the Kellogg Pact shall be equipped with "teeth" in order that it may masticate alleged "aggressors" and otherwise benignantly bite and gnaw its way to universal peace and concord. Unfortunately, there are many who appear to have been infected with these confused notions, which have been so industriously propagated in the United States. But, judged by the course of the principal members of the League of Nations during the past 10 years, and by their attitude toward the hostilities lately in progress in the Far East and elsewhere, such notions appear never to have had any real charm for the responsible authorities of the countries which would have been required to make the chief sacrifices in blood, in treasure, and in tears. To say this is not to impeach their wisdom or their sincerity. It may merely indicate that, having had enough of war, they long for real peace and an opportunity to recuperate.

Should the proposed measure become a law, no gift of prophesy is required to foretell what will follow. Groups moved by interest, or swayed, consciously or unconsciously, by propaganda, will clamor at the White House and at the Department of State for the unneutral application of the ban in favor of those whom they like or approve and against those whom they dislike or disapprove. We are assured that we may trust our authorities to resist such importunities, and to refrain from doing things that would involve the country in trouble. In other words, we are told that our authorities may be relied upon to refuse to exercise the powers so sweepingly conferred upon them. This is indeed a singular argument. Couched in the language of irresponsibility, it is not only self-stultifying but also unjust. The burdens and cares resting, especially at the present juncture, upon those who administer our affairs, are already grave and harassing enough without imposing upon them the pastime of playing with war. Within the terms of the pending resolution, our Government would be asked to set itself up in rash and arrogant judgment upon the acts of other nations and on the merits of their conflicts, with a view to give or to permit military aid to one as against another. Before committing ourselves to this presumptuous program, spun of the wild and flimsy fantasy that, when nations fall out and fight, the question of the "aggressor", which still baffles students even of ancient wars, lies upon the surface of things, and may be readily, safely, and justly determined by outsiders, of whose freedom from individual interest or bias there is no guaranty, we should reflect upon the fact that, had such a notion heretofore prevailed, we might, and in all probability, should ourselves have been the victim of it. As a marshaling of all the incidents would unduly prolong this letter, I will call attention to only two.

During our Civil War we were more than once menaced with the possibility of intervention, and, had it taken place, no one can say how fateful would have been the consequences. But, as an American, I share with my fellow countrymen, as members of a great and united people, the universal sense that it is well that we were not permanently divided.

On April 6, 1898, there assembled at the White House the diplomatic representatives of six great European powers, who made in behalf of their Governments what was called "a pressing appeal to the feelings of humanity and moderation of the President and of the American people in their existing differences with Spain." We need not question the motives of the Governments by which this remonstrance against our armed intervention was made. The President of the United States did not question their motives in his answer; but, with the conscious dignity that became himself as well as his great office, he expressed the confident expectation that the remonstrating powers would equally appreciate the effort of the United States "to fulfill a duty to humanity by ending a situation the indefinite prolongation of which had become insufferable." Two weeks later the Congress of the United States adopted a resolution under which the Government intervened with arms. The Governments that had remonstrated against this step evidently did not regard Spain as the aggressor in the unhappy controversy between that country and the United States. The implication was clearly and directly to the contrary; and, according to the theory on which the pending resolution rests, the remonstrants, when the United States forcibly intervened, might appropriately have declared an embargo upon the shipment of arms and munitions to this country while continuing to supply Spain with the implements of war. All this might, on the new theory, have been done in the name of peace, and if the United States had exhibited resentment, this might have been treated only as further proof of its malevolent and aggressive disposition. It is better to reflect on such things while the opportunity still exists. It would be inexcusably short-sighted to assume that what has happened before will never happen again. We might also remember that our war for independence was treated by the great majority of powers merely as an act of rebellion against lawful authority. We waged the War of 1812 in support of disputed claims of national right. Many of our own people, including General Grant, have condemned our War with Mexico as an unjust aggression; but I am not aware that any of them has taken the ground that the general interest or the cause of peace would have been advanced if the powers of the world, some of which were not then themselves above suspicion, had combined their forces to oppose or to crush us.

If the real purpose back of the pending resolution is simply to prevent the United States from furnishing implements of war to those who are engaged in armed strife, this may readily be done by providing for a comprehensive, nonpartisan embargo on the shipment of arms to all countries engaged in armed strife, whether international or civil. Such an embargo would naturally be announced and imposed by public proclamation. Of this no foreign power could complain.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I thought the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] was taking an unfair advantage of the Democrats when he introduced the last speaker as Professor BAKEWELL. In my own way I did a little research work on the question, and I find that the professor is really entitled to the designation of professor of munitions, because he comes from the leading munitions district in Connecticut.

I am greatly disturbed about my friend McFADDEN. He seems to be seeing international ghosts in everything. I just telephoned the clerk of my Committee on Claims to be very careful about these private relief bills that are on file there, to see to it that no international vipers or statesmen want any of these private relief bills that we have in that committee.

My friend Mr. FISH made a tactical error with me in respect to this bill. I originally thought that I would be against the bill, but Mr. FISH kept after me to read the minority report, and I read the minority report, and now I have to speak for the bill. [Laughter.] He tried a rather inadequate form of bribery upon me yesterday. He asked me how much time I was getting from Mr. McREYNOLDS, and I replied 5 minutes. He then said he would give me 10 minutes. If he had only said 15 minutes, I do not know what I would say today on this bill, because it seems to me that you can be equally illogical in arguing on either side of the bill. Our Democratic friends insist in their report in playing up Mr. Stimson and Mr. Hoover. If there was anything that determined the American people in the last campaign, it was the foreign policy of Mr. Stimson and Mr. Hoover.

I think hereafter that the less we say about Stimson and Hoover in Democratic reports the better off we will be. Why the Republicans have chosen an international issue to break with the President is beyond me, because if they fell down in anything it was in their conduct of international affairs. Their argument on this bill is that it has a tendency to make us violate neutrality. In another Republican administration we declared war, but we did not mean anything. We declared war against war, that we would be the champions of peace, and always be against war. There was a great war on against war. That was the purpose of the Kellogg Pact, for which they claim so much credit, and when we adopted the Kellogg Pact we immediately scrapped all our traditional policies concerning neutrality, because we bound ourselves there and then always to be against war, always to be against the aggressor nation, but now they come and say to us that the Kellogg Pact was a great thing, a declaration of policy, but it really did not mean anything, because there was no way of finding the aggressor nation, which, of course, to the logical mind, if any exists now in the Nation, is utterly ridiculous.

I am for this bill really because it shows that we are doing something in this war against war, that means something. We are actually sanctioning the Kellogg Pact. I did not believe in it. It did not seem to me to be of much use. because no declaration of policy, no written words without sanction behind them have ever meant anything to me, and the Kellogg Pact never meant anything because it had nothing in the way of sanction. Talk about this resolution driving us into war. If anything could drag us into war it was the Kellogg Pact. We left ourselves wide open. Countries are always at war or about to go to war. Every movement in international relations, every peace conference, every huddle of diplomats in Geneva or anywhere else, is not a peace movement; it is always a war movement. There is danger of war breaking out any minute, and to my mind this bill is a step in preparedness, if anything. It is that kind of preparedness that will keep us out of war.

We have inherited a very bad international situation. Back in 1922 we entered the disarmament conference. We scrapped our ships as a gesture toward peace, and by virtue of the disarmament conference we immediately became absolutely involved in the Asiatic affairs, for we took the lead in bringing about the 9-power pact. Good old 9-power pact. It has been completely forgotten in the present Asiatic situation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I cannot yield just now, but I will yield to the gentleman before the Claims Committee.

We scrapped our fleet in 1922 as a gesture toward peace, and we involved ourselves absolutely in every question concerning Asia. When the Japs marched into Manchuria, Stimson sat around a while, and all of a sudden somebody down in the State Department said, "Why, Mr. Secretary, these Japs are violating the 9-power pact. You ought to do something about it." He wrote a long note and he gave it to the press, protesting about what the Japs were doing. The Japs were a little bit more polite to Stimson than the Corinthians were to St. Paul, because in the course of time they wrote Harry and said, "Your note received and properly filed." That was the end of that protest. But just the same the American people, after the Secretary of State had protested against the Japanese violation of the 9-power pact, were left in a highly deplorable condition in their international affairs, because plainly and very obviously and without any argument the Japanese had violated a solemn treaty with the United States, and we had in 1922, in return for that solemn treaty, scrapped our magnificent fighting fleet. What he should have done, plainly what Stimson should have done, was to call all the signing powers who attached their seals to the 9-power pact into conference and protest as a unit of signing powers against the Japanese invasion; but he did not do that. He went off on his own and he wrote these notes that have been forgotten by everybody but Stimson and myself. [Laughter.]

Nations will go to war. Economic pressure will force nations to go to war. Anybody who has taken even a cursory glance at the Japanese situation knows that all the notes from Stimson or anybody else will not keep the Japanese out of Manchuria. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] said something about a red herring in this bill. That is the trouble with the Japanese situation. It is largely a herring situation. The Japanese are tired of living on dried herring, dried fish. There is not enough dried fish to go around, and by force of economics they have been forced to make this move, no matter how many 9-power pacts are created. There is no stronger force, to my mind, than economic pressure, except possibly what order comes from Tammany Hall now and then, and they are pretty strong. [Laughter.]

We can have war with or without this resolution. I do not entirely disagree with these gentlemen that the operation of this resolution may not mean war. It may mean war, but I believe it may mean the other thing, that when war is pending, and when we are threatened and our future is to be determined by something that is happening elsewhere, we can step in and by the mere denial to one country of munitions we may absolutely affect our own destiny and keep ourselves out of a great conflagration. I think it is a very sensible and practical proposition. Some people are talking about the Constitution in this matter. Other countries do not read article so-and-so of the Constitution. The Republicans do not have any need for JIM BECK on this constitutional argument, because McGUGIN has handled that; but foreign countries are not going to read article I of the Constitution to find out how we declare war. They will declare war in their own way. The Constitution is about to be the forgotten document. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] has expired.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. No; I cannot yield.

Only two people believe there is a Constitution, anyway. One of them is not JIM BECK.

My friend the gentleman from Texas, Mr. DIES, said what he would do in the present emergency. What I would do in this emergency is this: Plainly do the equitable and honest thing that the Republicans did not do—if we make any gesture in the Asiatic situation, it ought to be a gesture of good faith. We should immediately withdraw our extraterritorial courts from China. We have promised to do it. It would be a real recognition of the Chinese Government. It would give them a real standing before their own people and before the world, and it would be in the interest of economy. Even though the President gets this power, I do not think he should exercise it now in this Japanese-Chinese situation, but the right thing to do is what the Republicans did not do—and that is to keep faith with the Chinese as a separate entity and withdraw our extraterritorial courts. What is the use of our talking about the Japanese invading China when we have done it ourselves? We have not done it with marines and armies, but we have done it with courts and lawyers; and if you know anything worse than an invasion of lawyers, I do not know what it is. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I notice in the report of the committee it says:

> The present administration is very anxious that this bill be passed, feeling that it will be a great advancement toward the establishment of peace, whether used or not.

Mr. BLACK. The President agrees with me on that. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. O'MALLEY. Why does not this resolution go all the way if we are going into the question at all?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself sufficient time to read a letter that I have received. The question has been asked as to whether or not the administration is behind this bill. I want to read this letter of April 5, 1933:

APRIL 5, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. McREYNOLDS: I have given careful consideration to House Joint Resolution 93, and I am strongly of the opinion that this legislation should be enacted. I should greatly appreciate it, therefore, if you could find it possible to urge favorable action on this resolution. I hope that you will be able to succeed in having it passed in the form in which it was reported out of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and without the amendment which was introduced in the House when this legislation was being considered on the recommendation of the last administration—an amendment which would weaken its force and narrow its applicability.

The authority, which the passage of this resolution would confer upon the Executive, would be exercised by any Chief Magistrate of the United States to the sole end of maintaining the peace of the world and with a due and prudent regard for our national policies and national interests. The special circumstances of each particular case which may arise would dictate what action, if any, would be taken in that case, but the authority to act on terms of equality in cooperation with other governments when the occasion arises should be left to the discretion of the executive branch of the Government, which is charged, under the Constitution, with the conduct of our foreign relations. In justice to the firm convictions of the American people and to its own dignity, this Government should no longer be left in the position of being unable to join the other governments of the world in preventing the supply of arms and munitions for use in an international conflict when it is exercising its diplomacy and the whole weight of our national influence and prestige to prevent or put an end to that conflict. The enactment of this legislation would strengthen the position of this Government in its international relations and would enable us to cooperate more efficiently in efforts to maintain the peace of the world.

I am writing to Senator PITTMAN asking him to support this legislation in the Senate.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

This is approved by the administration.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. My recollection is that this letter was written on the heels of a call of the British Ambassador to the Department of State at the time he was conveying a message from the British Government on the question of embargo on arms.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman seems to be having visions these days and they seem to be running in circles. If there is anything progressive that he stands for, or if he stands for the best interests of his country, I have been unable to learn it from him recently.

Mr. McFADDEN. My knowledge comes from the reports that have been made.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oregon to propound a question.

Mr. MOTT. Can the gentleman from Tennessee inform us whether this resolution is a part of the President's program?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Had the gentleman listened to the reading of the letter and to my statement that it had been approved by the President, he would realize that that answered his useless question.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman from Oregon listened to the reading of the letter of the Secretary of State, and the gentleman from Oregon listened also to the statement of the chairman of the committee which reported out what has since been referred to as the "press gag bill", which was passed by this House with only 29 votes against it. We were told by the chairman of that committee that the administration approved that bill, that the President approved it; yet, immediately after it was passed by the House, both the Secretary of State and the President repudiated it.

The gentleman from Tennessee has answered my question directly, I think. He has said this is a part of the President's program. I thank him for the information.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I read the letter for the gentleman's special benefit.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, I am not here taking sides with either of the major parties of the House. I happen to be one of the few Farmer-Laborites here.

It was not many years ago since we had a war to do away with war; and it was not so many years ago that we elected a President because he kept us out of war.

The people of this country have voted for peace on several different occasions. We have made efforts to join the League of Nations, or the "League of Notions", and some other things that would involve us in international trouble. Every time the American people have had a chance to speak on this question they have spoken and spoken emphatically. I should think we had had just about enough of foreign entanglements, the thing George Washington advised us, in his final address, to stay away from. I may be absolutely mistaken and almost as visionary as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], but to me this looks like nothing more nor less than a hurry-up, very cleverly written plan by which the United States of America can sneak into the back door and the trapdoor of the League of Nations. Letters are being sent us by the League of Nations Association, Inc., of the United States, being sent to Members of Congress asking them to get behind this bill.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I ask unanimous consent to incorporate this letter in my remarks. I shall not take the time to read it.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I shall read the letter. The letter reads as follows:

APRIL 6, 1933.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH, JR.,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. FISH: I have recently been in touch with all the 43 congressional districts in New York State, and especially the 23½ in New York City. I want to tell you with what wide-spread interest and approval the action of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, in reporting out the arms embargo bill (H.J.Res. 93), has been received.

You will shortly hear from our members in your Twenty-sixth Congressional District, who look to you with hope and confidence for a favorable vote upon this bill that carries with it such vital national and world implications.

We of the political committee of the League of Nations Association are following in careful detail the plans of the opposition to this bill. We know just what a legalistic barrage is being laid down, and how telling some of its sophistries are. We ask you to look through this murkiness of thought and consider the implications of this crisis and its effect upon our own economic recovery.

Appalling ineffectiveness has resulted from the uncertain part that the United States has played in helping to keep the peace of the world. The north star by which we can guide our course is that of international cooperation. The machinery for peace and understanding must be maintained. This arms-embargo measure, we believe, after careful consideration, will have a cooperative and stabilizing effect. Such power in our Chief Executive's hands will give this Nation a new dignity and moral standing.

Yours with sincere regard,

HARRIET B. LAIDLAW,
Chairman New York Political Committee and Vice Chairman National Political Committee.

In my judgment, this is just another one of these attempts to sideswipe us, brush us off our feet, and sweeps us into an international tangle that is going to cause another war.

I for one am not in favor of giving anyone such power. Congress, and Congress only, has the power to declare war. If this Congress, if the President of the United States, if the State Department, if the people on both sides of this House, really desire peace, let them submit a resolution which will grant to the President the power, and make it mandatory upon him, to refuse to sell munitions of war, to place an embargo upon the sale of munitions of war to any warring nation throughout the entire world. I would support such a resolution. If you are sincere, follow this suggestion, for it will benefit the cause of peace throughout the world and will place the United States in a position where it can maintain strict neutrality and not bet on the wrong horse as we did several years ago.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LANZETTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I yield.

Mr. LANZETTA. Would not this policy leave the weaker nation at the mercy of the stronger nation?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I do not see why we should give anyone the power to shed more American blood to decide some foreign issue, a thing which would further increase our burden of debt.

Mr. LANZETTA. The gentleman is begging the question. I am asking him if this policy would not leave the weaker nation at the mercy of the stronger nation?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Unquestionably. From the dawn of history the weaker nation has been at the mercy of the stronger nation. We should stay away from these foreign entanglements. Once we were one of the weaker nations and we were warned at that time not to enter into them.

Mr. LANZETTA. Does the gentleman want that situation to continue, that the weaker nation shall be at the mercy of the stronger nation?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Do I want it to continue?

Mr. LANZETTA. Yes.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. There is no way of stopping it. There is no way of knowing who is going to be the weaker nation when we hear threats of war.

Mr. LANZETTA. There is a way of stopping it.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Germany was not the weaker nation in 1914. She is today.

Mr. LANZETTA. There might be a way of stopping it by having all the strong governments decide as to whether or not one nation is the aggressor.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. That is just another "League of Notions." It has never worked all down through history, and throughout the relationships of one country with another.

We passed a measure the other day the viciousness of which I saw the minute I read it. There were only 29 votes cast against it, the press gag law. After the press of the country came out showing what this measure really was, we found the administration repudiating it, yet we were told that the administration was back of it and that the President was back of it. After it was passed by the House we found it repudiated by the White House. It was an orphan. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK].

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I wish, indeed, there were ample time to discuss so fateful a measure as the one now under consideration. It seeks to vest in the President of the United States, to a large extent, the supreme issues of war and peace, for with this power his ability to implicate us in any war in any part of the world seems reasonably clear; and it is a fact, and perhaps I am now uttering an unconscious prophecy, that if this should become a law and a continuing policy of the Government, children yet unborn may rue with their blood the consequences of vesting any such power in one man, even though he be the President of the United States.

Let me begin my modest contribution to this discussion with a confession. When this matter was before the Congress in the last session and I received letters from a number of my constituents, exceedingly well meaning and high-minded people, asking me to support in principle the idea of giving the President the power to impose an embargo, I wrote, without adequate consideration of the implications of the proposal, that I was in sympathy with the proposal. But there is no inconsistency in my position today, because the proposition that I was then favoring differed essentially from the proposition that is now before this House, for, as I understood the proposition, as to which I was then asked to give my support, it favored a power in the President to impose an embargo in the event of war or a threatened conflict upon both or all warring nations, and thus removed the United States from the remote implication abandoning our historic policy of neutrality first formulated by George Washington.

The present proposal, however—and this is the fatal defect of this resolution—gives the power to the President in case of war in any part of the world or in case of threatened outbreak of hostilities, not merely to form an alliance with other powers to boycott one or both of the nations involved in the conflict, but it adds the dangerous power of saying that the President can select which of the two warring nations he regards as the aggressor and which this nation will favor by allowing munitions of war to be sent by our citizens and which it will discriminate against, because he does not believe in the righteousness of its cause, or for political reasons of a more general character.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. I can not yield at this time. Later I will, with pleasure.

Mr. BLOOM. I should like to inject just one point at this time.

Mr. BECK. I should like to develop my line of argument, and my time is very limited.

Therefore what you are asked to do is, not to allow the Congress, as the great council of the Republic, to determine whether the nature of any quarrel between foreign nations justifies the Congress in intervening in behalf of either power, but it involves the question of vesting in the President the power to pass upon the moral equities of any war and to discriminate in favor of one nation and against the other, and such discrimination is unneutral and is universally recognized in international law as a casus belli. if not war itself. No one can question, certainly, after the decision that we obtained in the Alabama Claims, that if we, as between, let us say, France and Germany, should decide to discriminate in favor of France and against Germany, or vice versa, that the nation against which we discriminated could, at the end of the war, put in a claim for damages because of our lack of neutrality, and in default of our paying damages, if it thought it had sufficient power, coerce us in the payment of indemnities by act of war.

Having made one confession that is not much of a confession, I want to make another.

A great deal has been said with respect to the Constitution in this matter. I believe this resolution does not violate the literal text of the Constitution. It does violate its spirit because it is destructive of its great purpose, and that was that the supreme issues of war and peace should never be vested in any man, even if he be the President of the United States, but should remain either for the President, in conjunction with the Senate, to pass upon foreign policies through treaty relations or the Congress to declare war. Therefore it is destructive of the spirit of our form of government, and certainly its historic policy of neutrality, but I shall not base my argument upon the narrow ground of the Constitution.

I have been, I trust, a diligent student of the Constitution for over 50 years. I have written a number of books on the subject and I have made innumerable addresses, which I have inflicted upon audiences, not only in this country but in England and in France. I have always adopted toward it what might be called the sacerdotal view of the lawyer, namely, that it is an instrument of infallible wisdom that by some divine self-executing power could perpetuate itself; and now, in my later years, I have awakened to what is to me a terrible reality, and that is that the greatest illusion of this country is the supposition that any country can be long restrained within the limits of a constitution. I might have known this if I had only read my Aristotle, for he said, 2,000 years ago, in his profound study of politics, that if the ethos or genius of a people should conflict with its written constitution it would be inevitably the written constitution that would succumb.

Therefore, it seems to me—and I hate to state it—that for 25 years, obedient to impulses from which we cannot escape, our constitutional form of government has been in process of dissolution and the process has been immensely accelerated in the last 4 years, and notably in the last 5 weeks. For that no political party is wholly responsible. It is simply the fact that you cannot confine a people, especially a people with a democratic genius, within the limits of any written constitution.

The subject matter of this resolution admirably illustrates this discouraging truth. If there was one thing that the framers of the Constitution were agreed upon—and there were very few things that they agreed about—it was that in creating a powerful chief magistrate, he should not have the power to pledge the faith and money and blood of the American people in any foreign war, or indeed in any foreign relations, that in any way limited the proud independence of this country to do whatever it pleased in any given contingency.

Therefore, they said that the President should not appoint any diplomatic representative in foreign nations unless the Senate concurred in his selection. We know how much of a dead letter that has become, because for years past the President has sent ambassadors at large to all Europe, and indeed to all the world, whose appointments the Senate has never consented to or even been consulted about.

The Constitution said in the second place that no treaty should ever be executed that would pledge the credit and the power of this country to any international obligation without the consent of two thirds of the Senate. But by protocols or understandings or informal engagements, that provision of the Constitution is, as I have said, largely a dead letter; and the subject matter of this resolution illustrates it, because it enables the President, when there is war or a danger of war, to select the nations with which we will cooperate in imposing a joint boycott against the power we deem the offending power. This means an alliance for mutual ends and would soon become an alliance, offensive and defensive, in violation of our historic policy of not becoming a party to such "entangling alliances." Such joint boycott could only be a practical intervention in the hostilities by a military alliance of neutral nations. You can call it what you please, but such an agreement to boycott would be a military alliance of outside parties against one of the two warring nations.

How completely the Constitution has failed in many important respects to carry out the wise limitations of the Fathers is further shown by the fact that while the Constitution forbids a President to declare war, and only Congress, as the great council of the Republic, can, after careful deliberation, declare war, and such declaration is its sole responsibility; yet we all know, and this resolution is an illustration of the fact, that the President can take steps that will inevitably mean, not theoretically, but practically, the entrance of this Nation into war, as long as the psychosis of any people is to follow blindly what may be the impulsive and prejudiced act of a President. Therefore you are giving to the President—and I do not say this President, but any President—this vast power. No such power would ever have been given to the Father of his Country. It was denied to President Wilson in a supreme crisis of civilization when Congress refused to authorize him to impose an embargo on the exportation of arms.

You are giving to the President the power to select, as between two parties, the guilty and the innocent, to substitute the judgment of one man for the judgment of a whole nation, and when we have done that we have given a casus belli, we have subjected this Nation to unlimited claims of indemnity; and we cannot complain, having thus intervened in the quarrel by giving to one what we withhold from another, if the successful party, if it be strong enough, should with its fleet and navies compel us to pay to the uttermost penny.

Let us realize what that means. Europe is at the moment on the edge of a volcano. If it does not break out in the near future, it will be on account of its futility and the destructive power which the devilish ingenuity of mechanics and chemistry have given to war and the comparative poverty of the quarreling nations. Nevertheless, there is unhappily only too much evidence at the present moment of an imminent outbreak in Europe due to the colossal mistakes in the Treaty of Versailles—a treaty created when the nations were not only sandbagged into insensibility but into a state of insanity due to their sufferings, because the Treaty of Versailles was the product of an insane psychosis.

Let me illustrate the possibilities of this proposal by something from history. Five years after the war of 1870, when France, the stricken gladiator, was slowly trying to rise to his feet, it occurred to the military party in Germany that it would be a wise thing to precipitate an immediate second war to crush France before she could again become strong.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. BECK. Bismarck saw the danger of that. He tipped off the intended attack upon prostrate France by giving it to Mr. de Blowitz, who was the Paris correspondent of the London Times. When it was published England and Russia protested, and then, under the cover of those protests, Prince Bismarck suppressed Von Moltke and the military party. Now, suppose that France, seeing that inevitably under the Hitler government Germany will regain her military power, shall determine that it would take any pretext—and it could have many technical pretexts under the broken covenants of this Treaty of Versailles—to commence war against Germany and crush her utterly. Suppose, then, that Germany makes an alliance with Russia and Italy, and that France has an alliance with the nations of the "Little Entente", and that England would feel constrained, because of its former alliances, to throw its great naval power into the scales in behalf of France. When that time came, if it should unhappily come, I do not know who would be President of the United States. It might be a man as ambitious as Caesar to play a great part in the history of the world. He could then simply say, "I will determine whether France and her allies or Germany and her allies are in the right in this quarrel. I shall invite other neutral nations to join with the United States in boycotting France", if France was the offending party in the eyes of the President, or Germany, if he regarded Germany as the aggressor. Does anyone question that would be an intervention, a deliberate and unneutral intervention, in favor of one group of powers and against the other?

Prof. John Bassett Moore, the most eminent authority on international law now living, so says. I listened with pleasure, and I may say admiration, to the speech that was made yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WEST]. It was forceful, clear, and worthy of the best traditions of the House, but I was amazed when I heard the gentleman, comparatively a young man, himself a professor of international law, say that John Bassett Moore's views on international law had, as he said, "crystalized", by which I imagine he meant "fossilized", 25 years ago in 1907. The intimation was that John Bassett Moore had learned nothing since 1907, and yet there is no chancellery in the world that would not today greatly value the opinion of John Bassett Moore. John Bassett Moore, in a letter to Mr. FISH, that is in the minority report, has said most clearly that any such discrimination is not only unneutral, but a casus belli, and would, if we were thus discriminating against a nation of strength comparable to our own, lead us to war, either then, or at some later date, when the party thus discriminated against had won its victory and turned upon us to compel us to pay damages for our unneutral act. Let me quote his language as that of a master in international law:

> Neutrality in the legal sense impresses not only impartiality, but also abstention from participation in the conflict. The prohibition of the neutral government itself to supply arms and munitions of war is based upon the unquestionable fact that the supplying of such articles to a fighting force is a direct contribution to its military resources, and as such is a participation in the war; and if a government does this, it virtually commits an act of war. If it does this in behalf of one of the parties, it abandons its neutrality and is guilty of armed intervention. * * * From the elementary principles of international law above set forth, it necessarily follows that if a government bans the shipment of arms and munitions of war to one of the parties to an armed conflict, and permits it to the other, it intervenes in the conflict in a military sense and makes itself a party to the war, whether declared or undeclared.

The letter of the Constitution may not expressly provide that to vest such a power in the President is a violation; yet, nevertheless, you are scrapping what is a historical policy of our country, written into the Constitution, in what was once thought to be letters of living light, that the destinies of this country should not be in the keeping of any one man, however admirable, however excellent, however well meaning, and even if he is the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee is not present, but I have no doubt he will yield the gentleman an additional 5 minutes also.

Mr. BECK. I thank both the gentlemen for the courtesy. What I wanted to dwell upon, because it gives me great satisfaction, although it has a rather indirect bearing upon this resolution, is a speech made 2 or 3 nights ago in New York by that arch charlatan of literature, George Bernard Shaw. The relevancy of this allusion will appear in a moment.

Mr. Shaw has for 25 years maligned and traduced this country. Even last November, when he was given the courtesy of an trans-Atlantic broadcast to the American people, he commenced it with the statement, "You boobs." He has capitalized his contempt for the American people by getting publicity out of his insults. If his gratuitous insults were only to sell his books, the more contemptible his insults are. He is a colossal egotist. While he reminds himself of Voltaire, he resembles the Sage of Ferney as a farthing dip the sun. It is incredible that we did not allow him to pass through this country unnoticed as beneath our notice. [Applause.]

And yet the Academy of Political Science did itself the doubtful honor of inviting this senile self-advertiser to address it. Mr. Shaw took the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York—and it illustrates what I have said as to the decaying faith of our people in their noble form of government that to the cheers and applause of 5,000 people Mr. Shaw proceeded to say that our Constitution was only a "charter of anarchism." He said that the American people up to 1860 were simply "emigrants", by which he apparently meant that we were then still uncouth and raw, although in that time we had produced Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Marshall, Hamilton, Webster, and Lincoln. He proceeded to say that the uncouth class of Americans in 1860 was succeeded by "100 percent Americans", who were imposing in their facades, talked very volubly and glibly, but never had anything to say or any thought worth expressing. He excoriated them. Then comes the point of my remark. He proceeded to say there were just two Americans who in his judgment had emerged from this class of ignorant Americans. One was William Randolph Hearst and the other was the present President of the United States, and he exalted both on the ground, as he said, that they were "violently opposed to the Constitution" [laughter], which he declared with his great knowledge "was not a constitution at all", and that our Statue of Liberty was a "monstrous idol."

Neither the President nor Mr. Hearst need any defense at my hands. Both would resent the stigma of being praised by Mr. Shaw. The President has done many admirable things, and I think we Republicans in this session have been ready and willing to admit it. Like the captain of the ill-fated Akron, when that boat rushed down to its doom, the President may have found it necessary, or thought so, to throw over considerable ballast, not merely in the shape of constitutional principles but also of basic ideals of American society, in order to keep our economic system afloat. It may be he is leading us to economic salvation. He may be leading us to economic destruction. I do not know which. Time will tell. What I do know is, that with high and noble purpose and with no deliberate attempt to overthrow the Constitution, he has taken extraordinary measures in extraordinary times.

Nor does Mr. Hearst deserve the discredit of Mr. Shaw's praise. For 10 years, in the matter of our foreign policies, he has valorously protested against scrapping the ideals of George Washington. [Applause.]

It is important to distinguish between the President as a smiling, gentle, high-minded, well-meaning, courageous, and energetic leader, and the "brain trust" that trades in his name, because the brain trust—made up of Professor Moley, Professor Tugwell, and Prof. Mordecai Ezekiel, if that is his name—trades, and too often [laughter], in the name of Roosevelt, formulates policies which we are asked to accept because the President so wills. The President gives his formal assent without much examination, and then this House forgets all its dignity as a deliberative body and feels that it must sign on the dotted line in the pious hope that the Senate will correct the defects.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Yes; the gentleman has been so gracious I am glad to yield.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman does not refer to the resolution we have under consideration as being the output of this "brain trust" that he refers to, does he?

Mr. BECK. I suspect it is, but I do not know. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. BLOOM. How can the gentleman suspect it is the output of this "brain trust" when it is the same resolution that was sent to the previous Congress by President Hoover and endorsed by Secretary Stimson? It could not have been.

Mr. BECK. If the two resolutions are identical, the gentleman's point is well taken.

Mr. BLOOM. They are identical.

Mr. BECK. Then the gentleman's point is well taken. I acknowledge it. I never had any sympathy with Secretary Stimson's foreign policy in the Manchurian matter. [Applause.] It was with great difficulty I repressed myself during the last administration from saying so on this floor. Why should we embroil ourselves in an oriental war?

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. BLOOM. Is it the gentleman's thought that the resolution we have under consideration refers to anything in the Orient? Is there anything that can be so construed by the wildest stretch of the imagination? We have heard the statement made from the floor, but there is nothing in this resolution or nothing that has ever been said by President Hoover, Secretary Stimson, President Roosevelt, or Secretary Hull which in any way brings in the Orient.

Mr. BECK. That may be so. I cannot say what are the purposes back of it. I am not in the confidence of its proponents. What I do know is that it is part of a tendency that is threatening the integrity of our Government and the independence of the American people. To make the President through his Cabinet ministers a dictator not merely of domestic policies, for which in this emergency there may be some excuse, but a dictator in our foreign policies, a power the Constitution vainly tried to protect us from, seems to be un-American and dangerous.

Mr. BLOOM. If I yield the gentleman further time, will he kindly answer another question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. BLOOM. Is it not a fact the consent that is sought by this resolution is something that exists at the present time in this country, a power the President of the United States has at this time and has had for many, many years?

Mr. BECK. Does the gentleman mean the power to impose an embargo?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes. We have had an embargo against the shipment of arms to China since 1922. We have had an embargo on all the American countries, and an embargo upon the countries over which we have extraterritorial jurisdiction. There is nothing new being asked in the resolution under consideration today, nothing which will bring in Japan. Japan has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BECK. To my colleague from New York, let me say, I did not bring in Japan and China.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman spoke of the Orient.

Mr. BECK. And, let me say, there is a clear distinction between Congress in a given emergency specifically authorizing an embargo, as was the case in the illustrations cited, and Congress giving the President continuing power to impose an embargo against any power he dislikes for any reason and in favor of any country he likes for any reason. [Applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. That is not this resolution.

Mr. BECK. Yes; it is this resolution.

Mr. BLOOM. No; read the resolution, please.

Mr. BECK. Now, let us see what the resolution provides. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes. I will give him my own time.

Mr. BECK. I do not want the gentleman's time; I want to hear from him.

Mr. BLOOM. No; go ahead. You and I can talk it out now.

Mr. BECK. Very good. Let us see what the resolution does provide. It states that after securing the cooperation of such governments as the President deems necessary, that enables him to pick out the allies in a military alliance, he makes proclamation of the joint embargo and it then becomes unlawful to export, "except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes"—therefore, he has unlimited power to play favorites—"any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country or countries as he may designate."

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. BECK. That is the proposition.

Mr. BLOOM. May I answer the gentleman?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Is there any statement there "as he may dislike"?

Mr. BECK. No; "as he may designate."

Mr. BLOOM. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but the gentleman said any country that the President may dislike, and I say that is not in the resolution.

Mr. BECK. I quite agree that that is not the wording of the resolution, but you give the President the power to "designate" who shall be the friends and who shall be the enemies of this country, and he can act according to public policy or according to his likes or prejudices or any other thing that moves the human mind.

Mr. BLOOM. It is exactly the same resolution that is in effect at the present time, and there is no such thing as the gentleman has brought out, as well as other gentlemen on his side, with respect to the power given the President. It is the same power that the President has now and this is building up something that we started to do a number of years ago. This resolution simply completes it.

Mr. BECK. I should like my friend to cite a single statute, from the beginning of the Government, that gave the President of the United States power to designate which nations we will favor and which nations we will discriminate against.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] will be pleased to answer that question, as our time is limited on this side.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 more minute, because I think we ought to clear this matter up. I have the idea that the confusion comes about because some Members believe that the President has such authority now, because the President can place an embargo on a country where there is internal disturbance. This is an entirely different proposition. This resolution is aimed against belligerent nations and that is where the unneutral act comes in.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, for my part, whatever comes, I propose to stand by the historic policy of this country and the spirit of the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there is no Member of the House who more enjoys listening to the scholarly and able gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] than myself. I regret very much, however, that his extraordinary ability is arrayed today in opposition to that which I conceive to be a righteous cause.

A great deal has been said about this resolution in order to prejudice the purpose for which it has been introduced. The tactics of the criminal lawyer have been employed by the opponents of the resolution.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], in his first speech of the series of speeches he has made upon the question, said that this was entry not into the cellar door or the back door but the front door of the League of Nations, and he seeks to appeal to those who are prejudiced against the League of Nations in order to gain the support of those who are opposed to the League. Then another one opposing the resolution cites some organization in New York that he does not think is very popular in this country, and because, forsooth, this organization favors the resolution, proclaims that it should be defeated. But it remained for the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] to bring into the question the recent visit of George Bernard Shaw, who has incurred the hostility of the American people, by trying to link the resolution with that unpopular individual. I see no relevancy between Mr. Shaw and the pending resolution; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is usually most logical, wholly failed to point out the relevancy.

If this resolution will accomplish what it is intended to do, it will tend to preserve peace and make war more difficult; and if it will accomplish or even tend to accomplish this objective in the slightest degree, I am for it.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Not now.

The prevention of war is one of the highest duties that government owes society, and any nation that will not take every precaution and use every legitimate means to avert the holocaust of war is unworthy to stand among the civilized nations of the world. [Applause.]

Those who are opposing this resolution seek to make it appear that the resolution is to cause war and to make peace more difficult. This is the old trick of the criminal lawyer who tries to make it appear that the man who is charged with crime, instead of being a criminal, is a law-abiding citizen and that instead of being a man who should be confined in a felon's cell the man whom he killed should have been slain.

I say that the whole opposition to this resolution is based upon a false premise and that the grounds urged against it are not supported either by history or by facts.

Before discussing the arguments made by the opponents of the resolution permit me to say that the principal witnesses who appeared against this resolution in the exhaustive hearings that the committee held were the munition manufacturers, who came all the way from Connecticut and elsewhere to appear and testify against it and who claimed that its passage would injure their business. Their testimony was not referred to, either in the lengthy report of the minority or in any speech that has been made against it, even including that of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, in which State most of the munition factories are located.

The truth is, Mr. Speaker, the arms manufacturers have on too many occasions, as they have on this one, exerted their influence against legislation designed to minimize the threat of war. They have exerted this influence by means of propaganda against this Government's program of disarmament. They have stimulated the purchase of munitions by governments by direct urging of governments to compete with each other in building up their armaments and by indirect propaganda playing upon the fear of war just as they are doing in opposing this resolution.

This resolution does not threaten the legitimate interests of the arms manufacturers; but it is designed to try to preserve peace, even though it may affect the business of those who manufacture munitions of war. The cause of peace and the prevention of war is of more importance to America than the profits of any group. In the awful depression from which we are suffering we are still paying the price of the World War.

Now, what is the first proposition urged against this resolution? Take the minority report, and what do they say? They try to discredit it by using high-sounding adjectives and phrases, just as the gentleman from New York did. He said in his speech that this resolution was not an act of peace but of war; that it was novel; that it was dangerous and revolutionary.

Now, that statement is true or it is not true. It is either novel or it is not novel. It is either revolutionary or not revolutionary. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, who just preceded me, evidently had not looked into the history of this country as to this resolution, or he would not have made the statement he did when he said that there never had been such a power vested in the President of the United States.

The statutes, if he had taken the time to examine them, would have contradicted him when he said that such a delegation of power had never been given the President.

In 1898, when McKinley was President, and you will find this in the Thirtieth Statute, page 339—Congress passed this resolution which I am going to read, and you will see that it is far more drastic than the one we are considering. It gives the President far more power and with less restriction.

> The President is hereby authorized in his discretion, and with such limitations and exceptions as to him may seem expedient, to prohibit the export of coal and other material used in war from any seaport of the United States until otherwise ordered by Congress.

The resolution we have here in giving this power to the President directs that he shall consult with other governments before invoking it, and this resolution that I have read does not do that. The President, under the law of 1898, could consult other governments or not, as to him seemed expedient. He may select under the resolution the aggressor nation, or he may say, "I will invoke it against all countries." There is no limit and no restriction as to his authority or the manner in which it should be used.

Now, this law, passed in 1898, remained the law until 1912.

In 1905, when Mr. Roosevelt was President, he acted upon that resolution. I read now from the Thirty-fourth Statute, section 3183, a proclamation by the President of the United States.

The Spanish-American War had long since ceased. This proclamation was issued when there was no state of war, simply under the authority conferred on the President.

The proclamation reads as follows:

> Whereas by a joint resolution approved April 22, 1898, entitled "Joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States", the President is "authorized, in his discretion, and with such limitations and exceptions as shall seem to him expedient, to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress."

Now, therefore, I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, for good and sufficient reasons unto me appearing, and by virtue of the authority conferred upon me by the said joint resolution, do hereby declare and proclaim that the export of arms, ammunition, and munitions of war of every kind, from any port in the United States or in Puerto Rico to any port in the Dominican Republic, is prohibited, without limitation or exception, from and after the date of this my proclamation until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

And I do hereby enjoin all good citizens of the United States and of Puerto Rico and all persons residing or being within the territory or jurisdiction thereof to be governed accordingly.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 14th day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and five and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirtieth.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

By the President:
ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BACON. Was the Dominican Republic at war with any other country at that time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not know and I do not care. It does not have any bearing whatsoever on the resolution. If it had been at war, the President could have invoked it. If it had not been at war he could have invoked it. The President, under that resolution, had the power to invoke it against a country that was at war, or a country that was at peace, or against any and all belligerents. The limitation was simply "in his judgment, as to him seemed best."

Mr. BACON. The only thing is that I do not see why Congress did not repeal that resolution immediately after the Spanish-American War.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman's party was in control. William McKinley was President under that. He was succeeded, as I recall it, by Roosevelt, and then by Taft, and it remained the law until 1912, when it was amended. It was not repealed, but it was simply amended so as to apply to domestic disputes in American countries. That was the law in 1912. In 1922 that law was still further enlarged so as to apply not only to domestic disputes in American countries but to every country over which the United States exercised extraterritorial jurisdiction; and that is the law at this time.

This resolution, instead of being revolutionary, instead of being unprecedented, as someone else has said, simply rounds out and completes the settled policy of the United States for 35 years. Those gentlemen who grow red in the face in denouncing it as revolutionary and as a child of the League of Nations, do not reckon with the facts, because this was the law before the League of Nations was ever thought of, and before George Bernard Shaw had ever said anything derogatory to the United States.

They say this is aimed at Japan. That is another effort to try to prejudice the resolution. Unfortunately there are a great many people in this country who all the time talk about being for peace, who say "I abhor war", and who say that war should be stopped, but they always are content to take it out with talking against war, but they never vote for any measures to prevent war. The trouble, my friends, is this, we cannot simply decry war——

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Did the gentleman oppose the last war we had?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I refuse to be diverted from the discussion of the pending resolution by answering such irrelevant questions.

Now, I was talking about Japan. They say this is aimed at Japan. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] was paid quite a tribute by the able chairman of our committee yesterday, and I thought he was entitled to it, because the last time we had this resolution under consideration at the last session practically all Republican Members, except my good friend from New York [Mr. FISH], and Mr. Maas, were favorable to the resolution; but since the advent of my good friend from Massachusetts under his tutelage there has been a right-about face, and the entire delegation except one signed the minority report. The gentleman gave out an interview in which he said that this resolution was aimed at Japan. I suppose it is not proper to criticize my colleagues, but I thought it was a rather undiplomatic remark, even if the gentleman believed such to be the facts, because that is the way war is brought on. Somebody goes out and makes a certain statement that a certain act is intended to affront a certain country. That is the way we brought on fights when I was a boy. Somebody would say, "Do you know So-and-So is talking about you?" These gentlemen who either in debate here, or in the press, or elsewhere, say that this is aimed at Japan disclose a lack of diplomatic if not patriotic spirit; especially is this true on the part of members of the Foreign Affairs Committee of this House. The Secretary of State says it is not so intended.

The only statement that the gentleman produced in the committee to show it was so intended was the expression of some newspapers. I should rather take the statement of Cordell Hull, the Secretary of State, who knows what is back of the resolution, than to accept statements of individuals who rely merely upon newspaper statements, who do not know what the facts are.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Could it not be used against Japan in the present instance, if the President saw fit to so use it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It could be used against any country which the President saw fit to use it against; but, as answering the charge that it is intended to be used against Japan, the facts are that Japan manufactures her own munitions, and we exported to Japan last year only $41 worth of munitions from the United States. If we were exporting vast amounts of munitions from the United States, there might be ground for that charge.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Can the gentleman explain how much cotton was exported to Japan?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Cotton is not a munition of war, under the definition of what constitutes munitions of war. Some years ago Hon. George W. Wickersham, then Attorney General, defined what constitutes munitions of war, and his definition is still acted upon by the State Department. It is as follows:

Articles primarily and ordinarily used for military purposes in time of war, such as weapons of every species used for the destruction of life, and projectiles, cartridges, ammunition of all sorts, and other supplies used or useful in connection therewith, including parts used for the repair or manufacture of such arms, and raw material employed in the manufacture of such ammunition; also dynamite, nitroglycerin, or other explosive substances; also gun mountings, limber boxes, limbers, military wagons, field forges and their component parts, comprising equipment of a distinctively military character; articles of camp equipment and their distinctive component parts; and implements manufactured exclusively for the manufacture of implements of war or for the manufacture or repair of arms or war material.

Foodstuffs, ordinary clothing, and ordinary articles of peaceful commerce are not included in the prohibition.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. I am not afraid of levying against Japan, but I am afraid of being involved in war. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is what those who are against the resolution say, but does anyone think that the President of the United States wants war any more than the gentleman wants it? Does anyone believe that the Congress of the United States is more anxious for peace than the President of the United States? The Congress has the power now to levy an embargo, and someone asked yesterday, Why not let Congress levy the embargo instead of the President? I will tell you why. Because the Congress of the United States might not be in session, in the first place, when the necessity arose requiring its levying, and in the second place, the levying of an embargo can be done by diplomatic handling of the President much better than by Congress, where we cannot carry on diplomatic negotiations, and because if Congress had to levy the embargo we would have a great deal of unnecessary and inflammatory talk, which instead of accomplishing the purpose of the resolution would defeat it.

The mere fact that the President possesses the power would be one of the strongest reasons why it will never be necessary for him to use the power. If the countries against whom it was thought the power might be invoked knew that the President possessed that power, the President could, in a diplomatic way, indicate that it might be used, and the effect would be as great as though he did use the power.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. It has been stated here this afternoon, I do not recall by whom, that under this resolution the President would have the right to determine who is the aggressor. For my enlightenment, will the gentleman please tell me whether that is true?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In answer to that question, those who have opposed the resolution have read into it that which is not in the resolution. To have heard the addresses of those opposing the resolution one would imagine that the resolution contained the language of the selection of the aggressor. Upon reading the resolution it will be discovered that there is no such language.

As I said a moment ago, the power, the method, the circumstances, the facts under which it would be used would be left to the President, just as the law of 1898 left it to him, except this—that in this act it directs the President to consult with other nations before taking any action. If he thought proper he could exercise it in such way as to be against one country and not another, or he could exercise it against both; but he could, if he thought best, consult all of the munition-manufacturing countries before he did it.

Mr. ADAMS. Assuming, for the purpose of argument, that he could, would the passage of this resolution deprive the Congress of the power of rectifying any mistake that he might make?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It would not. The last portion of the resolution provides the language, "until Congress shall decree otherwise", just as the act of 1898 did. I am glad the gentleman brought that to my attention. The language is:

> * * * it shall be unlawful to export, or sell for export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country or countries as he may designate, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Would it not be a fact that it would take a two-thirds vote of the Congress to change the order of the President in the event the President should veto the act of Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; it would not. It would simply take an affirmative declaration by Congress. It would not be a veto by the Congress, it would be simply the enactment of a repealing statute.

Mr. MOTT. But could not the President veto that act?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Of course, he could veto any resolution he desired, but this resolution affirmatively vests in Congress the power to revoke an arms-embargo proclamation.

Mr. MOTT. Does not the gentleman think it would be better and safer if the resolution provided for the ratification by Congress of the act of the President?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not. I do not think the resolution would then be worth anything, because you would have to wait until Congress could pass upon it, and the time for its effectiveness would have passed. The sole question is this: Are you willing to leave this question to the President of the United States, just as we did in 1898, and as we did for 14 years without any limitation whatever, and for 21 years with limitations?

Furthermore, every other major munition-manufacturing country, except Czechoslovakia, has already delegated this power to its executive head. There are only five countries that produce arms and munitions on a large scale, and all of these, with the exception of the United States and Czechoslovakia, have already delegated that power to their executive heads, and in order that we may cooperate with other countries in preserving peace, it is necessary that we should do that also, and that is the sole concern. It is not leveled at any particular country, and the State Department advises that its passage is sought for use against no specific country.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. TINKHAM. May I ask the honorable Representative if he believes the United States should join the League of Nations?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The question of the gentleman proves what I have said, that those opposing the resolution are seeking to divert attention from the resolution and its merits by dragging in questions not involved, and I refuse to be so diverted.

The minority report contains a statement from Professor Borchard, of Yale University, to the effect that the grant of the power to the President to act, after conferring with other countries, without ratification by the Senate, is unconstitutional.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] is too good a lawyer to make such a contention, and in his speech today stated that he did not believe the resolution contravened the letter of the Constitution.

The truth is that Congress has frequently delegated to the President the power to take action, after negotiations with other governments, and such power so delegated has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States.

As supporting this contention, I call attention to the following specific instances where such has been done:

First. The Nonintercourse Acts of 1809 and 1811 (2 Stat. 530) and 1810 (2 Stat. 606), which conditioned the suspension of trade upon the proclamation of the President as to the attitude of other governments.

Second. Our tariff acts have long proceeded upon this principle.

The Tariff Acts of 1890 and 1893 (26 Stat. 612) and the Tariff Act of 1897 (30 Stat. 203) had provisions of this sort.

Under the Tariff Act of 1890 the President was empowered to suspend the free entry of certain articles from other countries, if he was satisfied that their governments imposed unequal and unreasonable duties on our products. In the celebrated case of Field v. Clark (1892) (143 U.S. 649), the constitutionality of this provision was attacked and it was contended that the provision delegated to the President "both legislative and treaty-making powers." The Supreme Court, in holding against this contention, after citing numerous precedents, used this language:

> * * * that in the judgment of the legislative branch of the Government it is often desirable, if not essential, for the protection of the interests of our people, against the unfriendly or discriminating regulations established by foreign governments, in the interests of their people, to invest the President with large discretion in matters arising out of the execution of statutes relating to trade and commerce w'th other nations.

The Tariff Act of 1897 (30 Stat. 203) went farther and authorized the President "to enter into negotiations" with other governments, with a view to securing reciprocal and equivalent concessions, and when such governments entered into commercial agreements with the United States, or made concessions in favor of our products, the President was authorized to suspend the imposition of certain duties.

Third. The President has frequently proclaimed the existence of reciprocal copyright relations with other governments under act of March 4, 1909 (35 Stat. 1077).

Fourth. He has negotiated a common policy with other governments concerning relief from double income tax on shipping profits under Revenue Act of 1928 (45 Stat. 791).

Fifth. He has also issued many proclamations after negotiations with other countries, suspending discriminating tonnage duties.

The opponents of the resolution have repeatedly referred to the opinions of John Bassett Moore and Professor Borchard as being opposed to the resolution.

Eminent lawyers who are experts in international law are earnestly supporting this resolution, and ably contend that the reasons assigned by Mr. Moore and Professor Borchard are not tenable. Among these I refer to Manley O. Hudson, professor of international law of the Law School of Harvard University; Ellery C. Stowell, professor of international law of American University, who, by the way, is the author of an able and valuable book upon the subject of International Law, published in 1931; Joseph Chamberlain, professor of international law of Columbia University; David Hunter Miller, historical adviser of the State Department, and also an eminent authority on international law. I wish that I had time to quote from briefs prepared by these eminent authorities, which sustain not only the constitutionality of the resolution but refute in able and convincing manner the contention that the resolution violates the law of neutrality.

These authorities point out that the law of neutrality has undergone many changes since the Hague Conference in 1907, due to the World War, the League of Nations, and the Kellogg-Briand Peace Pact.

After all, the question of whether or not this resolution might be so used as to violate the law of neutrality or involve us in war would depend upon its exercise by the President. The arms embargo law which we have had upon the statute books for 35 years has never involved us in war, or even threatened to do so, although it has been invoked and used against the following countries: Brazil, China, Cuba, Honduras, Mexico, and Nicaragua.

Surely we can trust the President of the United States, whoever he may be, to exercise this authority with a due and prudent regard and in such a manner as to preserve peace and not to provoke war. I feel sure that President Roosevelt would so act, and I am confident that his successors would, as have all Presidents since 1898 in the same wise and judicious manner.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have an opportunity to vote for this resolution. It does not go as far as I would like to see it go.

Whenever the world reaches the point where all countries are willing to prevent profits from the manufacture of munitions of war, from that date we will have a decrease and lessening of war influences. In my humble opinion, a great deal of the trouble in our South American countries has been the result of the greed of munition makers. I think they were at the bottom of a great deal of our trouble.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. McKEOWN. For a very brief one.

Mr. PATMAN. What about the greed of the oil producers in the South American countries?

Mr. McKEOWN. As the gentleman knows, all greed runs together. All these greedy crowds are helping each other. What I am saying is that if today no nation on earth could export arms at a profit less war talk would be heard. One thing is certain, civilization and war cannot exist in the world at the same time. The time has come when, if the civilizations of the world are to survive, war must be destroyed. If it is not outlawed, war will destroy civilization.

Now, you know, when a man talks peace a lot of people in this country talk about him as though he were a coward. They do not realize that the man who talks peace is the man who fights our wars. The last scrap I had when I was a boy, and I did all my scrapping in my boyhood days, was when I got hold of a fellow who did not want to fight. I have never had a fight since that moment. Beware of these fellows who do not want to fight. The pacifist is the man who fights the war these military fellows get us into. This is the truth about it when you get down to the last analysis of the matter.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. That is just where the gentleman is mistaken. The statesmen are the ones who get the soldiers into war.

Mr. McKEOWN. I may say to the distinguished gentleman from Oregon I am not talking about the soldiers of this country. God knows if there is anybody who has my sympathy it is the soldier in the American Army. I am not talking about him. I am talking about this crowd which, every time one talks peace, wants to stir up a fight. Now, you fellows are trained to fight. All you know is fighting. [Laughter.] That is all you want to do. That is what we have you for. I am talking about peace.

When a man stands flatfooted for peace in the world he is immediately branded as a pacifist and caricatured in the papers of the country along the lines of the caricatures published of our dry friends, a man with a long, tall hat and a long, black coat. Let me tell you that the men who have stood for peace in the world have fought the battles of the world whenever they have been called by their country, whenever it is necessary to defend the ashes of their fathers. They will fight and die for the churches of their God. They will fight and die for the mothers who gave them birth and for the wives who nurse their babies at their breasts. Although these men talk peace, they will fight.

The civilization of this world today is in a shaky condition. There is no telling when and where the spark is going to alight. This resolution is a step forward.

Seventeen years ago I ran on a platform, the first written platform I ever ran on, and the only one, I may say, Mr. Speaker. I never ran on a written platform since. In that platform I said that if profits were taken out of war, the chances of having war would be reduced. [Applause.] We are nothing but neighbors. This thing is just common sense. We nations are just like neighbors. If John Smith living over the hill comes to my house and wants to borrow my shotgun to shoot Bill Smith across the creek, would I be a good neighbor if I loaned him the gun? So it is with nations. The nations are neighbors. We should not let one neighbor have guns to shoot up another nation.

Let the nations place an embargo on arms and munitions of war, and the peace and civilizations of the world will be saved. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON].

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas referred to the resolution of April 22, 1898, and compared it with the resolution we are discussing today, citing it as a precedent. I think there is a great distinction between the two resolutions. Under no sensible construction can the resolution of April 22, 1898, be considered as a precedent for the resolution before us.

On April 22, 1898, Spain was about to go to war with the United States. The resolution of that date was a war measure to prevent coal and other war supplies reaching the hands of the Spaniards. Quick action was necessary. As a matter of fact, Spain declared war on us on April 24, 2 days after the passage of that resolution. It was simply a war measure, a protective measure for our own country. On April 22 we had already begun a blockade of Cuban ports.

That resolution remained on the statute books without amendment until April 14, 1912, when it was amended to make its provisions apply simply to a country on this American Continent, in which existed conditions of domestic violence, thus narrowing very greatly the purpose of the original war-time resolution.

In 1905 President Roosevelt did apply it to Santo Domingo, but Santo Domingo was not at war with any other country. Conditions of domestic violence prevailed in Santo Domingo, and President Roosevelt merely applied the resolution of April 1898 in the precise manner in which Congress eventually amended this act on April 14, 1912. I think the Members should have clearly in mind this distinction between the two resolutions and should clearly distinguish between an embargo in the case of an American country not at war, in which there is only a state of domestic violence, and an embargo on one or more countries which are actually at war. Under this resolution, if the President declares an embargo against one of two belligerents, he must of necessity take sides and force this country to take sides, the will of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding. The consequences of such action and the implications of war are such as to be fraught with the greatest of dangers. There is therefore no precedent for the resolution we are discussing today.

If the motives of the proponents of this measure are in the interests of peace, I am in accord with those motives. I am fearful that the passage of this resolution may lead to new hatreds and possible war. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I modestly rose here yesterday afternoon when one of my pacifist friends was speaking and I feared I would be a firebrand, and immediately he yelled at me, of course, "Munition manufacturer", and "jingo." This is the answer to all those of us who are rising now and trying to inject some common sense into these men who follow the old ladies in wanting peace, peace. Of course, we all want peace. There is no division of sentiment on that point, but the question is, How are we going to get it?

We are not going to get peace through emotionalism, but we are going to get it through the application of rules of good, hard, common sense.

When I read the report of this committee by my Democratic colleagues I noticed they used for their arguments those presented by the late President of the United States and his Secretary of State, and I want to tell my Democratic friends right here that this releases me. I am not following Herbert Hoover or Stimson. [Laughter.] I do not approve of either one of them.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is the gentleman following the present administration?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am not following Herbert Hoover.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is the gentleman following Franklin Roosevelt?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Yes; I am one of the most loyal followers he has in this House.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Then get on the bandwagon.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. And I shall continue to follow him loyally, but I abdicate to no man the things that I consider basic and essential in the preservation of the integrity and the honor of my country. [Applause.] I take unto myself this right, and no man nor party shall control me in this respect.

My head has grown gray in the service of my country. I have had to face bullets when such statesmanship as this has brought us into war. How ridiculous is this idiotic, insane idea of accusing soldiers of creating war. It is the statesmen, the bankrupt statesmen who create war [applause], and the poor, damned soldier is the pawn. He is the one who has to correct the mistakes that you make. Such mistakes as are written into this measure he will have to blot out with his blood.

Now, what is the genesis of this matter? What brought this out? Let us get down to brass tacks.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 more minute.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The genesis of this thing was shown in January. The European powers found out in the League of Nations that their decisions against Japan had no teeth, that they had no sanctions, so they are pulling us in just like they did during the World War, and we will be left to hold the bag. They are pulling us into the oriental maelstrom, and I am inclined to hope that the Philippines will have the good sense not to concur in your late action here; but you are throwing this question into the Philippines and you will be left holding the bag in the Orient under any such law as this. This will be the immediate effect of it.

Why should we interfere in these affairs? Why not tend to our own business and stay at home? [Applause.] Why should we pick favorites in disputes that occur in the world? Even to this day it is questioned who caused the World War, and here we are going to march right in and decide who are the aggressors and who are bringing on war. Such a thing is ridiculous and, for one, I shall never follow any leadership that proposes such laws as this. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr TOBEY].

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Speaker, I hold that action under this resolution would contribute but little toward the great objective of world peace.

Any nation contemplating waging war, realizing it would have to meet an embargo on munitions such as is provided for in this resolution, would, as a preliminary to the commencement of hostilities, import a tremendous quantity of arms and munitions. The provisions of this resolution make no restriction upon those nations whose foresight and means will permit them to prepare adequately for war.

In considering this question of an embargo on munitions the United States should not have as its aim the mere handicapping or punishing of the aggressor nation, which obviously would accrue to the advantage of the opponent in the conflict. Our objective should be more worthwhile. It is, or should be, the peace of the world.

I hold that any traffic in arms and munitions thwarts this high purpose and therefore, in my judgment, should be barred.

To this end, and in accordance with my convictions, I shall introduce in this House a resolution which provides for a real embargo on the shipment of arms and munitions to all nations and an embargo on the raw materials to manufacture such things, and shall vote against the adoption of this resolution.

What can be a greater hypocrisy than for America to ship to other nations tanks, arms, and munitions to carry on the hell of war, while at the same time we claim to be sincere in our desire to make an end of war?

I yield to no man in harboring a deep passion for peace, but, in my judgment, the first real requisite for peace is disarmament.

Now, the most powerful and at the same time most subtle enemy of disarmament, and therefore of peace, is the armament ring, so called, a group of munition and armament makers in almost every nation, ours included. They have been active in fomenting war scares and in encouraging their own countries to increase armaments. They have attempted to bribe government officials both at home and abroad. They have disseminated false reports as to the military programs of foreign countries. They have sought to influence public newspapers in their own and foreign countries.

All these statements have been substantiated by investigations, and yet this subtle influence persists.

Consider the investigation conducted by the Senate committee of the activities of one Shearer. Therein were brought out the facts that this undercover propagandist was in 1927 commissioned by certain ship-building companies in this country to go to Geneva and attend the Disarmament Conference and report his observations, for the sum of $25,000. No written contracts were found, and all agreements were verbal, and a large part of the payment was made in cash.

As a sequel to this, in August 1929, this same pseudo patriot filed a complaint in the New York courts for $257,655, alleging it to be due him from three American ship-building corporations for service as propagandist, naval expert, and lobbyist.

The collapse of the Coolidge naval disarmament conference at Geneva in 1927 has been attributed to the efforts of this man.

Such are the workings of invisible government.

What must have been the feelings of thousands of American mothers whose sons either paid the supreme sacrifice in the World War, or returned with bodies maimed and scarred for life, or ravaged with disease, who rejoiced in the movement of our then President, Calvin Coolidge, to bring about world disarmament at that Geneva Conference, to make the possibilities of war more remote, when they learned through this investigation of the subtle, contemptible machinations of armament and shipping concerns of this Nation to undermine this effort, through their paid agent, Shearer.

The constitutional rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness that accrue to every mother's son under the Constitution were nothing to these schemers. Family, home ties, human relationships—what are these compared with the American dollar?

I am sorry for those whose anger does not rise at the devilishness of such work.

Of old, one wrote:

Follow after the things that make for peace.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the path of peace lies through the workings of such an embargo as this resolution would authorize, and I am opposed to this resolution.

These are times for serious thinking. We do not know just where we are going, but we know that we are on our way to a new order in many lines.

No less an authority than the Yale Review in an issue of last year made this statement:

Changes are taking place, which in the light of a hundred years from now, will appear to have been almost revolutionary.

The experience of recent months and years must have brought home to each of us that many of our systems of business, systems of finance, and even of government, have failed.

The hearts of men and women the Nation over yearn for a real solution of our difficulties. There is a rising dissatisfaction with the old order of things. If we of mature years cannot sense it, let me bring to your attention the appeal of youth. I quote from an address made by a college undergraduate in New England a year ago, who said:

We who are approaching our majority have been looking forward for years with hopeful anticipation to the epoch when we should take our place in the world, but as we observe the world today in economic and financial chaos, with wars and rumors of wars, and without outstanding leadership, we cannot be blamed if we ask of what value is the business and financial scheme of things which has brought about our present conditions.

We find insincerity, greed, and selfish ambition common to everyday life in the business and political world. We realize that no satisfactory arrangement has been made to protect youth from being victimized by the germs of prejudice and hate which infested our homes during war time. We youth do not claim to have the mental seasoning which will enable us to withstand the strain of directing mankind's affairs, but we have a growing desire to know just why, since old-order methods have seemed to bring increasing chaos during these post-war years, the ideals of the new order for which youth fought cannot be given a free trial in the courts where world problems are settled. We feel that you should do all within your power to prevent youth from again being victims of a war in the declaration or in the final settlement of which we have no share.

Mr. Speaker, we struggle here over the balancing of the Budget, we condemn the evils of high taxation, we seek the stabilization of industry and the restoration of prosperity. Such striving and efforts will be vain if we fail to make peace the normal attribute of our national and international order, and I do not interpret this resolution as pregnant with hope of peace.

Today is Good Friday. In every community, large or small, thousands of men and women all over the land turn to those days nearly 2,000 years ago, when Christ overcame the bonds of death and rose to newness of life.

Can we better observe the day, or more fittingly pay tribute to His memory, than by here highly resolving that He did not die in vain, and that to Him, the Prince of Peace, shall be paid our measure of devotion, by consecrating ourselves to the holy cause of world peace?

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the basic fact to be kept in mind is that this resolution does not give to the President new and unusual powers.

The President is now vested with, and has for many years been vested with, powers of a similar character, but these powers are limited to declaring embargoes where internal strife exists within the borders of nations on the American continent or in nations over which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction.

The extension of powers is twofold. First, it extends authority to apply to all countries. Second, it extends it to include cases where there is actual international war or threats of war.

The resolution in granting this extension of powers to the President makes a very definite reservation or condition, which I consider the crux of the problem. That reservation is this: Only after securing the cooperation of such governments as the President deems necessary is he empowered to make proclamation of an arms embargo against any nation.

Let me consider the full import of this clause. It safeguards the United States against the suspicion of unfriendliness to any nation against which the embargo is declared. For the embargo is not the sole act of the United States, but one taken in cooperation with other arms-producing nations. The list of nations which have already granted similar authority to their chief executives includes Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, the Netherlands, Canada, Belgium, and Russia. Thus this has already become a recognized policy among the nations, adopted advisedly as a means of preventing war. The one outstanding nation that lags behind, as it has lagged behind in foreign policy for the past 12 years, is the United States of America.

Therefore the argument that our extension of such powers to the President would tend to cause war seems to me untenable. The argument overlooks the fact that any war of resentment would have to be against all cooperating nations, which would be in effect all the leading nations of the world.

There has been much said here in regard to the President's exercise of this embargo power being a violation of neutrality. My able colleague from Ohio demolished that argument yesterday. I merely wish to add that this is the fallacious argument and final defense of all opponents of enlightened measures designed to safeguard the nations against war and to promote peace. Moreover, if this Congress were to postpone action until all the authorities on international law were to be heard on this, it would never take action. Since the authorities disagree, little light could be obtained from them. While the doctors disagreed the danger of the most frightful malady of modern times—world war—would spread.

We find the objection to this extension of powers to the President, to put us in line with the other nations of the world, come from two sources. First, there are those we have heard so eloquently argue on grounds of international law as it existed in 1907. They see in it a violation of neutrality that would tend to cause war.

The other objectors are the arms and munitions makers, with some of the aircraft manufacturers. At the public hearings held by the Foreign Affairs Committee last session full opportunity was given these gentlemen to state their objections. A study of their statements shows that they were naturally concerned as to the effects on their business. As is to be expected, they thought in terms of trade. No one can criticize them for this. A very grave fear of the word "embargo" was revealed by these objectors, and unconsciously they interpret this resolution as one that will adversely affect now and hereafter all foreign trade in their special lines.

Now, I believe in the promotion of foreign trade, on both the import and export sides. I desire the same or better opportunities for our arms and aircraft manufacturers as those of other nations have. So I have given careful consideration to these objections and find them not quite valid.

Both airplane and armament manufacturers argue that the embargo would be an incentive for every country to build its own munition plants. It would appear that no one country can build every kind of munition plant and manufacture every kind of war material. Imports of special design and of new types are always necessary during a war. Furthermore, a nation at war seldom has the man power, the materials, and the equipment to make all munitions needed to carry on the war. Such a self-contained and thoroughly prepared nation is a rosy dream of the munitions makers.

Seventh. This extension of the embargo power will have the same effect as any other and all other effective steps toward peace. But it will not affect our airplane or arms or munitions manufacturers any more severely than it does those of other cooperating nations, and so it will not put the United States in a disadvantageous position in case that the war we all wish to avert should not be averted.

Finally, the State Department's representative showed from all records that the airplane manufacturers had not suffered from embargoes laid by the President on shipments of arms or munitions of war to various countries in past years.

The opposition has stressed the fact that this is not an emergency measure. I note, however, that the distinguished gentleman who so vociferously asserted this used the major portion of his time in picturing conditions in all parts of the world that visualized impending, if not actual, war.

As for me, I am unalterably opposed to war. I do not believe that war is inevitable any more than I believe that smallpox is inevitable. The latter scourge was brought under control by courageous men of science, and I believe that war can be controlled by courageous cooperation of nations in the use of preventive measures.

An emergency exists right now. Every informed student of international affairs knows this, and knows that the restlessness due to adverse and intolerable economic conditions is at work in the nations of the world. "Anything is better than this", is the cry too often heard. Such psychology breeds war. Now is the time to act. Now is the time to cooperate with other nations that are trying to maintain peace. And the act for us to take here and now is to pass this resolution today, which, as I see it, is a vote of confidence in our President and a vote for the cause of peace. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask if it is in order now for me to ask for time to address the House? The time seems to have been all allotted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIROVICH). The Chair thinks it is not, as we are operating under a special rule adopted by the House.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, in speaking in support of this resolution I am not unmindful of the fact that I am a new Member of this House and that, whether as a new Member or one better known to the Members, there is probably nothing that I can say that is new upon the question or questions that are herein involved.

Indeed, it seems to me if the events of history have left the world unconvinced, have left the Congress unconvinced, that all possible means of securing peace in the world should be adopted, then mere words are futile.

President Roosevelt is asking for this power; the Secretary of State in the last administration, Mr. Stimson, an able diplomat, a great Secretary of State, recommended this resolution. Nearly all the other great countries of the world already have vested this power in the executive heads of their governments. Several of the other great powers have asked that this power in our Government be granted to the President.

No unusual or extraordinary power is sought to be vested in the President under this resolution. In 1911 the Congress gave the President the power to lay a similar embargo with respect to the American countries in order to prevent domestic violence. It is only sought here to extend to the President, with respect to European countries, the power to lay an embargo upon arms, but that power is subject to the qualification that the embargo will not be laid until the President has secured the cooperation of such other countries as he deems necessary.

It is to be presumed that the President of the United States will exercise this power, as he is presumed to exercise other powers, only in the interest of securing the welfare of this country and securing the welfare of other countries, and that he will use it wisely. It is necessary to assume this with respect to the more important powers that are vested in the President. An unwise President, a weak President, could by the exercise of the powers already vested in him by the Constitution plunge the country into war whether this power to lay an embargo were vested in him or not.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who heads the minority report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs against this bill, uses many words in an attempt to prove that this is an extraordinary power and that it is dangerous to grant it to the President. The minority report contains a multiplicity of words, but is barren of any constructive thought. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] quotes the memorandum submitted by two professors, said to be authorities on international law, in an attempt to prove that neutrality, in the sense of international law, is still existent and still possible. But if it be true that there may be another great war in which we may not be involved, it is also more and more true that we are very likely to be involved in it.

I shall not attempt in the brief space of time allotted to me to discuss the various phases of this question, which have been very ably presented by the majority members of the Foreign Affairs Committee and by others who have for a long time been familiar with the object sought to be accomplished by this bill. But I should be ashamed not to stand up and be counted as an advocate of world peace.

It is easy to sneer at the efforts to promote world peace. It is easy to sneer at those who believe in strengthening the means for international conciliation and the means of preventing and prohibiting war. It is easy to sneer at men and call them idealists, internationalists, and even pacifists, but I am not ashamed to be an advocate of world peace. I am not ashamed to be called an internationalist, and I am not ashamed even to be called a pacifist, provided that with this term there does not go the assumption that I will not support and defend my country in its lawful pursuits. Men of my blood, forbears of mine, have served in every war fought upon the American Continent from the earliest struggles between the French and English.

But I do not believe that any good or constructive thing has been accomplished by any war in which we or any other nation ever engaged which might not have been accomplished without the shedding of blood, save only such conflicts as have been fought in pursuance of what Jefferson called "the sacred right of revolution." I do not believe that the cause of civilization will be advanced through the mangling and crippling of the bodies of my sons and of your sons by the instruments of modern warfare.

The minority Members, opposed to this resolution, have injected the issue of the League of Nations into this simple question. Let me say here that there is nothing in this resolution which should deter anyone who honestly opposes our entry into the League of Nations from voting in favor of it.

We are not here to debate the question of the League of Nations. Let me say, however, that while the issue of the League of Nations is not at all pertinent to this question, I wish to contradict that often-repeated statement made by the opponents of this resolution, that the League of Nations has been repudiated by the American people.

The Republicans won the national election of 1920 and elected Warren G. Harding President of the United States, and there followed the most shameful and corrupt period in our national history, with the possible exception of the administration of President Grant. One would think that even the opponents of this resolution would hesitate now to refer to the national election of 1920 and the events that followed it. They must, indeed, be hard up for arguments or else they must believe that the American people are very forgetful.

So far as the League of Nations is concerned as an issue in that campaign of 1920, Mr. Harding and the Republican Party obtained unquestionably some millions of votes under false pretenses and by deliberately deceiving the American electorate, because Mr. Harding upon several occasions during that campaign gave a solemn pledge and promise to the American people that he favored and would further our entry into the League of Nations or some similar association of nations designed to secure peace. That he and his managers in that campaign fooled the American electorate about this issue is shown by the fact that 1,000 American citizens, men and women, who were leaders in all lines of life, nearly all of them Republicans, signed a statement urging the election of Mr. Harding as President, and said they were doing so upon the understanding that he favored the League of Nations and the entry of the United States therein.

Among those 1,000 were such prominent Republicans as former President William H. Taft and Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler. There were also numbered among them a majority of leading college and university presidents, many of them as prominent in education and letters as the professors of international law cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] in the minority report upon this resolution.

The justness of a cause may often be known by its enemies as well as by its friends. I have never known an association of undertakers who opposed the passing of sanitary measures or of public health laws upon the ground that such measures or such laws would increase the death rate. But if there were such an association of undertakers who did oppose health laws upon such grounds, I would question the sincerity of their motives and the truthfulness of the reason that they gave for their action.

There was a World War from 1914 to 1918, and the United States was brought into it, and that war left us nothing but our debts, the memories of those who were killed and of those who suffered. The League of Nations did not bring us into the World War. The power of the President to lay an embargo upon arms did not bring us into the World War. National isolation will not keep us out of another world war, if one ensues, any more than the national economic isolation, attempted as a policy for the last 12 years of Republican misrule, has kept us from suffering from the greatest depression in our history.

The opponents of this measure are apparently untouched by the events of history or by the march of mankind.

It is a significant fact that in the hearings held upon this resolution in the Seventy-second Congress by the Foreign Affairs Committee the principal opposition to the bill was presented by the representatives of the manufacturers of arms and munitions in this country. And while I do not question the motives of any Member of this House who opposes this resolution upon the ground that he fears that it may involve us in war instead of promoting peace, I say again that the fact that the manufacturers of munitions and arms in this country are opposed to this resolution is to my mind an argument in favor of its adoption, and when they give as their reasons that they fear lest it may promote war, I put them in the same category as those in the instance just assumed.

In the debate upon this question it has been the favorite argument of the opponents of this resolution to refer to those who favor it as pacifists or internationalists. I am surprised that the ranking minority member of the committee [Mr. FISH] did not also call us communists. The calling of such names does not constitute a good argument, although it may persuade some people who think by using copybook terms.

The opponents of this measure speak sneeringly of the fact that various peace associations are supporting this resolution, such as the Foreign Policy Association, the League of Women Voters, various associations for the advancement of peace, and the Association for the League of Nations, as though that in itself constitutes a condemnation of anything that they support. And yet these same opponents do not hesitate to align themselves with the various organizations and interests who have profited by other wars and who are unquestionably fearful lest the peace association shall prevent war and lessen the demand for arms and munitions and thereby cut down their profits.

The opponents of the resolution claim that peace is their object. Well, inasmuch as they resort to this method of argument by calling names, I think it would be fair to say that their emblem should not be the dove of peace but that other bird of sinister hue and keen vision which soars high in the air and which looks afar, not for its living but for its prey long since dead.

Washington and Jefferson have been quoted, or rather misquoted, with regard to entangling alliances. I wonder why those who still rely upon that antiquated argument do not refuse to avail themselves of the radio, the wireless, the airplane, or even the automobile, and use the stage coach for their physical as well as their mental movements.

In the interest of humanity and of the welfare of our own people and of the people of the world I urge that you grant this power to the President. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time allowed, I beg your indulgence while I attempt to call your attention to two phases of this problem which I think have not yet been emphasized, if, indeed, they have been mentioned at all in this discussion. Let me remind you, no matter how anxious we are to maintain peace, that the philosophy back of this proposal is the philosophy of force. Indeed, if we will examine into most of the proposals for the maintenance of peace, starting from the Versailles Conference and crystallizing into the agreement reached by so many nations, but not including our own, upon the Covenant of the League of Nations, you will find that underlying all those proposals for the maintenance of peace was the doctrine of force. That doctrine is set forth in the tenth article of the Covenant and in the sixteenth article. The sixteenth article, I may remind you, is what may be termed the boycott or embargo article, to be employed by the powers strong enough to employ it.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I decline to yield at this moment. I have not the time.

Mr. BLOOM. I shall give the gentleman the time, if he will yield for a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I prefer not to. I may have the time in a little while. Any embargo put into effect by any government must in the last analysis rest upon force. It cannot possibly succeed unless the government imposing the embargo is strong enough to maintain it in the face of opposition, especially the opposition of its proposed victim. It is proposed by this resolution to authorize the President of the United States, as I see it, to employ the force of the Government and the people of the United States in cooperation with other governments likewise employing force to discipline, as it were, some other power.

I can remember very well the discussions which went on in 1919 in another body in connection with the League of Nation's Covenant, and it was generally conceded by the proposers and the supporters of the Covenant that it could not possibly succeed unless the great powers giving their adherence to it understood in advance that the force which they could employ collectively would have to be employed in the event that some other nation ran amuck. It is now proposed that the President of the United States be authorized to make an agreement with one or more other powers to employ the force of the United States to discipline those other powers. We start off by the imposition of an embargo. It seems a simple thing to do at the outset. It is easy to talk about; but before you have gone far in the enforcement of an embargo, you find that the field to be covered by the embargo grows with astonishing strides. I have asked during this debate for someone to define the term "munitions", and I am told that Mr. Wickersham, a former Attorney General of the United States, has given a definition of it. I have not yet heard the definition. If he gave his definition while he was Attorney General of the United States, the definition is hopelessly out of date, for there is scarcely any article used by human beings today which, in the event of a major emergency, does not become a munition of war. An embargo under the circumstances of modern war is the equivalent of a blockade. It must be put into effect and carried on by force. The country that decides to enforce a complete embargo of munitions against another country will, before it gets through, employ its armed vessels. I have opposed the doctrine of force or the philosophy of force as applied to the attempt to bring about universal peace. I think we are going exactly in the wrong direction. We cannot force people to be good and we cannot force nations to be good for any length of time. It has always been a matter of wonder to me that so many gentle-hearted people, including ministers of the gospel, and members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, who desire to bestow great benefits upon the world and spread sweetness and light, invariably apply for help from the police force.

And that is just what this embargo thing implies. It proposes that we shall attempt to enforce peace, and when it comes down to a practical demonstration which powers are going to employ the force, will it be what might be termed "the second-or third-rate powers"—the little countries? Not at all. It will be a group of the great powers, not to exceed 4 or 5 or 6 in number—and they will want us to be with them—who will seek to place all the rest of the world in a strait-jacket and keep it there, under the threat of employing an embargo or blockade against any nation, especially the smaller ones, that dares misbehave itself in the matter of threatening some degree of hostility. So let us not fool ourselves as to the grim facts that lie underneath these proposals for the employment of an international embargo. It must in the last analysis be enforced with guns—guns mounted on ships and guns in the hands of men treading the surface of the earth.

One other phase of this thing I desire to impress upon you, if I may, something I have had very deeply at heart for many years. We Americans are not a homogeneous people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York 2 additional minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We may say that the people of France are a homogeneous people, as they come largely from one race.

We may say the same of the British people, who come largely from Anglo-Saxon and Celtic mixtures. We may say the same of the Germans and we may say the same of the Spaniards, but we here in America come from many national origins, many racial origins. We are a conglomerate people. I firmly believe that Washington understood that fact when he warned us against becoming entangled in foreign politics [applause], because we are peculiarly susceptible to the danger of dissension here among our own people whenever we take part in a foreign quarrel, because our people are apt to sympathize with one side or the other, in view of their separate and differing national origins. If we clothe the President of the United States with the power to decide which nation abroad is erring, which nation should be disciplined, instantly we invite all the sympathizers of that nation, residents in and citizens of the United States, to protest against his proposed act. We invite all the enemies of that country or nonsympathizers who are citizens to urge him to act. This thing means dissension among the people of the United States, because it injects the Government of the United States into foreign politics. The instant you do that you inject foreign politics into our domestic politics. I would regret the day when the President of the United States, attempting to act for all the people, was called upon to choose sides in a foreign quarrel. This proposed resolution attempts to put that very responsibility on him. The doors of the White House, under those circumstances, would, figuratively speaking, be stormed by the adherents—adherents through descent and sentiment—of the various foreign nations involved in the dispute and dissension would arise in America.

My friends, go very, very slow before you endanger the happiness and contentment of the American people. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has again expired.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the gentleman who has just taken his seat and other gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon and yesterday on this resolution, it would appear to me as if they all had in their hands one of George M. Cohan's flags. They have all been waving the American flag and none of them has really interpreted this resolution as it was originally intended and reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee. They are reading more things into the resolution, they are making more statements that are not in the resolution, than anyone could possibly imagine.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] knows it never has been the thought or intention of the last administration or this administration that this resolution should refer in any special way to Japan. Personally, I think it is absolutely wrong that any Member of the Congress of the United States should stand upon this floor and make the statements that have been made with reference to this resolution and its connection with Japan.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. No; I do not yield now.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I should like to know what nation it does refer to.

Mr. BLOOM. Does the gentleman want his remark in the RECORD?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I said I thought it referred to Japan, and I still think so, and that we inherited this from the old administration. If it does not refer to Japan, what nation does it refer to?

Mr. BLOOM. It refers to no nation in particular. There is no one who knows that better than the ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Mr. HAMILTON FISH. Let me tell you something about this matter. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] brought this matter out at the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and when word went back to Secretary Stimson that Mr. FISH was speaking with reference to this resolution and its connection with Japan, Mr. Stimson resented that remark and statement and inference, and he came before the Committee on Foreign Affairs to deny the statement of the gentleman from New York, and to say that it was untrue that this resolution in any way had any connection with or reference to Japan or any other particular nation. What happened after that?

The bill was presented again to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Again the gentleman from New York made the statement with reference to Japan, and I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] went to the State Department and examined letters and papers and cablegrams and everything else that was there, and went through everything from A to Z, in order to convince himself that this resolution had reference to Japan. I think the gentlemen who have spoken on this floor against this resolution and have introduced this war talk and talk about peace have done more to harm the friendly relations of the nations of the world than a thousand such resolutions can bring about.

Now, let us see who are the people that oppose this resolution. Yesterday a Member asked who they were. At the hearing before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs statements were made by Mr. Joseph C. Green, Division of Western European Affairs, State Department; Miss Dorothy Detzer, representing the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom; Mrs. Helen Hoy Greeley, Madison, Wis.; Mrs. N. N. Nock, representing American War Mothers; Miss Jeanette Rankin, former Member of Congress.

The following witnesses were against the resolution: Mr. Luther K. Bell, general manager Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce; Mr. Guy Vaughn, director Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce; Mr. W. A. Mara, vice president Stinson Aircraft Corporation; Mr. Luther Becker, Chief, Iron and Steel Division, Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce; Mr. Charles F. Barndt, representing the Great Lakes Aircraft Corporation; Mr. Thomas A. Morgan, president Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce of America; Mr. H. F. Beebe, representing the Winchester Repeating Arms. Co.

Oh, they are opposed to this resolution. They are all fighting very hard now against this resolution. Mr. Samuel M. Stone, president of the Colts Patent Firearms Manufacturing Co. They are for peace! They are opposed to this resolution because they want peace. The Honorable EDWARD W. GOSS, a Representative in Congress from Connecticut. Mr. F. J. Monahan, representing the Remington Arms Co.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BLOOM. Why should all these peace-loving people oppose this bill? The Remington Arms Co., the Colts Firearms Co., all the munition manufacturers and the people around New Haven, Conn., come down here and say: "This is terrible. I have got two American flags in my hands. I am waving two. I am for peace. I sell revolvers and I sell guns." That is the evidence here.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Certainly.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. If we got rid of our munitions of war, where would we get supplies for our next war?

Mr. SISSON. We do not want to have any.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Does the gentleman believe such a condition will ever come to pass?

Mr. BLOOM. You know one always goes back to Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Madison, Monroe. I should just like to read something that is really in point. I am not going to go back to Washington because I am afraid when my good friend from Pennsylvania over here——

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I shall be delighted to yield.

Mr. BECK. I was wondering how, in view of the very notable and distinguished service the gentleman now speaking rendered his country in recalling the great memories of Washington, he reconciles that service with his present policy, that of scrapping the policy of George Washington. [Applause.] May I just add to the question, as a double-barreled one, how, as a true and tried Democrat, he reconciles his present policy with the statement of Jefferson which proscribed entangling alliances.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will agree with me that the statement that was made on the floor of this House about Washington's position regarding foreign entanglements was never made by Gen. George Washington.

Mr. BECK. I said Jefferson.

Mr. BLOOM. I am going to prove the other fellow wrong first before I prove the gentleman from Pennsylvania wrong. That is a fact, is it not?

Mr. BECK. Yes; Washington never said it.

Mr. BLOOM. Washington never said it. Jefferson did. As long as we are on the subject, let us find out what Jefferson said on another occasion. I think the gentleman will agree with me that conditions in Washington's time were entirely different from conditions of the present time. We were not manufacturers of munitions in those days and had nothing to export. And although, literally speaking, Washington did say these things at the time his proclamation was made—there is no question about it—but in spirit, the gentleman will agree with me, Washington thought otherwise. Now let us get back to the subject and see what Jefferson said. This is very interesting, Mr. Speaker, and I think it should be told. Jefferson, to the British Minister, May 15, 1793, said this:

> Our citizens have been always free to make, vend, and export arms. It is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress their callings, the only means, perhaps, of their subsistence, because a war exists in foreign and distant countries, in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle and impossible in practice. The law of nations, therefore, respecting the rights of those at peace does not require from them such an internal disarrangement in their occupations. * * *

Now, Jefferson said we are going to sell munitions of war any place we want to sell them; that we are manufacturers over here. Is that what Washington said? No. He did not care what happened. He did not care what treaties there were. He said, in effect: "If you ship munitions or other contraband and you are caught, you must lose your cargo. The United States will not protect you."

A thing that should be remembered is that the authority which would be conferred upon the Executive by the passage of this resolution would be exercised by any Chief Executive of the United States to the sole end of maintaining the peace of the world. This is all we are concerned about. We are only concerned about maintaining the peace of the world.

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the honorable Representative say whether or not he thinks it is our first duty to maintain the peace of the United States?

Mr. BLOOM. It is strange no one has applauded that statement. Really and truly, that should have been applauded, and I am going to applaud that myself. Let me ask the gentleman a question: Does the gentleman from Massachusetts think that we can maintain the peace of the United States without maintaining the peace of the world? I do not believe the gentleman thinks of the peace of the United States without considering the peace of the world.

Mr. TINKHAM. I certainly do, I will say to the honorable Representative.

Mr. BLOOM. Then the gentleman wants to be alone.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman kindly explain how you can maintain peace without force?

Mr. BLOOM. In other words, the only way the gentleman and I can get together is to keep on punching each other all the time. Is this the gentleman's idea of peace? I should like to find out what is the gentleman's idea.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Answer my question.

Mr. BLOOM. That is the answer. The gentleman believes in fighting and, at the end of the fight, having peace.

Mr. HOEPPEL. How is the peace of the municipality maintained here except by force? That is the way you maintain peace everywhere.

Mr. BLOOM. No; we do not maintain peace by force. We have our police patrol to maintain peace, but we do not go up to a man and hit him over the head with some kind of club and say, "Now, you have got to be quiet because I have got you down."

Mr. HOEPPEL. That is what they do here in Washington, D.C.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] yesterday asked what was considered munitions of war. I do not know whether I shall have the time, but I should like to put in the RECORD General Wickersham's opinion as to the definition of "arms and munitions of war." This will answer the gentleman's question with reference to cotton, and will answer questions with reference to all the things that are considered munitions of war.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. I do not know what Mr. Wickersham says in that letter are munitions of war, but I know that Lee marched north to get shoes and flour for his army.

Mr. BLOOM. I agree that the gentleman does not know what is in this letter and I am going to put it in the RECORD and the gentleman can read it tomorrow and find out what is in it.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from Henry S. Coffin, of the Union Theological Seminary, a letter from W. Russell Bowie, of the Grace Church Rectory, a letter from Heber Harper, of the Teachers College, Columbia University, New York City, a letter from Prof. Irving Fisher, of New Haven, Conn.—I have one man in New Haven who is with us—and Mr. H. S. Person, of the Taylor Society.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how many letters are there?

Mr. BLOOM. Four or five.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Are these letters from some old ladies or all of them from some preachers?

Mr. BLOOM. I do not think the gentleman ought to object to the letters of the old ladies or preachers.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not think they should go in the RECORD, and I therefore object.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including the letter from General Wickersham to which I referred.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIROVICH). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. BECK. Will my friend yield for a question?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman with his usual charm has illuminated this discussion with many historical references, which would not surprise the House, and I want to ask him one other question, and that is whether he thinks our War of Independence would have been won and this Nation created and Washington made an immortal character if we had been unable to import munitions from France.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman ought to know we did not import munitions from France. They were given to us and France sent them over here. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield just for a correction?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from New York 1 more minute.

Mr. BECK. Is it not a fact that far from being a gift to the United States the munitions of war were imported from France through the so-called "commercial house of Roderiques & Cie., under which name the Beaumarchais masqueraded, and that France always contended and made us recognize that we owed France for the munitions thus furnished?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUNDEEN. Why not yield the gentleman time and let us enjoy the comedy?

Mr. BLOOM. This is not comedy.

Mr. LUNDEEN. It is to you, but it is not to us.

Mr. BLOOM. If the gentleman knew more about the subject under discussion, he would know how serious it is.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from New York 1 additional minute.

Mr. BLOOM. I may say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I meant no disrespect, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] and I understand each other perfectly. I will answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this way.

In the first place, France sent munitions of war and sent money over here. This was not until she had found out that we were on the road to victory. The first money that was sent over here was sent through France by Spain. LaFayette, when he was 19 years of age, escaped from France and went to Spain and left from Spain for the Colonies.

Not until long after did France make any claim at all for any money or for any debt regarding munitions that she sent over here. It was not until long after the representations made by LaFayette that France came across and gave us help.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield 2 minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to ask the gentleman if the reason for the opposition of the munition makers to this resolution is because they are afraid that it will plunge the United States into war? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOOM. The munition manufacturers and the aircraft manufacturers seem much concerned about this resolution. They oppose it. They are the only ones who oppose it. I can really understand why the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] would object to the insertion in the RECORD of the letters that tell the true story.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. No.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman has mentioned my name.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman can get his own time. His is the only objection that has been made to the introduction of letters or anything else in this debate.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman knows that it is not customary to insert letters from different individuals in the RECORD.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman objects to the insertion of the letters, but I will get them in some way. [Laughter and applause.]

The Wickersham letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D.C., March 25, 1912.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE.

SIR: The President has requested me to send to you and to the other Departments concerned in the enforcement of the proclamation issued by the President March 14, 1912, pursuant to the joint resolution of Congress approved on that day, respecting the extradition of arms and munitions of war into Mexico, a definition for practical use in the carrying out of such proclamation.

In my opinion the phrase "arms and munitions of war", as used in the said joint resolution and the President's proclamation, should be interpreted as referring to those articles which are primarily and ordinarily used for military purposes in time of war, such as weapons of every species used for the destruction of life, and projectiles, cartridges, ammunition of all sorts, and other supplies used or useful in connection therewith, including parts used for the repair or manufacture of such arms, and raw material employed in the manufacture of such ammunition; also dynamite, nitroglycerine, or other explosive substances; also gun mountings, limber boxes, limbers, military wagons, field forges, and their component parts, comprising equipment of a distinctly military character, articles of camp equipment and their distinctive parts, and implements manufactured exclusively for the manufacture of implements of war or for the manufacture or repair of arms or war material.

Foodstuffs, ordinary clothing, and ordinary articles of peaceful commerce are not included in the prohibition.

Respectfully,

GEO. W. WICKERSHAM, Attorney General.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute for the purpose of calling attention to the inaccuracy of the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM]. He stated that I visited the State Department in order to examine letters and files there in connection with this resolution. I never asked or never was invited and did not look at a single letter or file in the State Department that had any connection with the pending resolution. In spite of what the gentleman said, his statement is totally inaccurate, false, and uncalled for.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM] also denied that Washington gave any advice about entangling alliances. I want to read an extract from his Farewell Address.

* * * when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall dictate.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

If that is not a protest in plain English against entangling alliances what other possible meaning can it have?

Now, I want to say most emphatically and most deliberately, after listening to this debate, that I know of no other nation that this resolution is aimed against except Japan. I want that to go into the RECORD. If it is aimed against any other nation let us hear what nation it is. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLOOM].

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] read from Washington's Farewell Address I still say, and in the statement of the reading of the gentleman from New York, that Washington never made the statement regarding entangling alliances; and in that statement that the gentleman from New York just read I maintain it still does not say entangling alliances.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH].

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, I am more opposed to this resolution than I have been to any other resolution that has been before Congress since the resolution of April 1917, which decreed that we should enter the World War. Claude Kitchin, a man with a bigger heart and brain than any other man who was a Member of this House in those deplorable war days, said here on this floor in speaking against the war resolution:

Profoundly impressed with the gravity of the situation, appreciating to the fullest the penalties which a war-mad moment will impose, my conscience and judgment, after mature thought and fervent prayer for rightful guidance, have marked out clearly the path of my duty, and I have made up my mind to walk it, if I go barefooted and alone. * * * I have come to the undoubting conclusion that I should vote against this resolution.

It takes time to demonstrate just who are our men of real vision. Had the Sixty-fifth Congress followed the leadership of Claude Kitchin in reference to the resolution plunging us into the World War, how changed would be our position now. Upward of a hundred thousand young lives would have been spared. Upwards of $50,000,000,000 would have been saved. We would have no moratoriums or conferences on European debts. We would have no sick and disabled soldiers filling our hospitals, and there would be no World War pensions to oppress us for years to come. America would still be loved, and would still be the light of the world.

If Claude Kitchin were here now, in my opinion, he would rather resign his seat in Congress than vote for the resolution being considered here today.

If this resolution becomes the permanent law of this country, in time to come it will add almost countless tombstones to the acres and acres of white marble slabs over in Arlington that now mark the long, long resting place of the American boys who fell as a result of the resolution of 1917. If this resolution now being considered becomes the permanent law of our country, it will cause, in time, the sands and soil of the United States to be stained with thousands of barrels of blood from the hearts of the young men of America.

Let us read this resolution once again.

Resolved, etc., That whenever the President finds that in any part of the world conditions exist such that the shipment of arms or munitions of war from countries which produce these commodities may promote or encourage the employment of force in the course of dispute or conflict between nations, and, after securing the cooperation of such governments as the President deems necessary, he makes proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, or sell for export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country or countries as he may designate, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

First, it is provided that the President, whoever he may happen to be, wise or unwise, with strong war tendencies or otherwise, a patriotic lover of America or an ambitious man eager for glory and self-renown—any President must delve into the disputes and conflicts of the world and decide which nation he thinks is right and then place an embargo against the nation he thinks is wrong. He surely would not place an embargo against a nation he thinks is in the right. If this would not engender foreign entanglements, I do not know what would. The President of the United States, and through him all the people of this country, sitting in judgment on the disputes and wars of all mankind!

After coming to a conclusion as to who is right in the trouble, the President then secures the cooperation of such governments as he deems necessary, after consulting with them as to their views of the situation, and places the embargo. By so doing the President would be entering into an alliance and entanglement with as many or as few nations as he sees fit. The embargo itself, under such conditions, would be tantamount to a declaration of war. Such action on the part of our Government, even if it did not itself lead to war, would engender bitterness that would last for years.

Says one, "So you have no confidence in President Roosevelt." I am not talking about President Roosevelt. I am thinking about it from the standpoint of all the Presidents yet to be. This resolution, if it becomes a law, will last for all time unless it is repealed. Further, let me say I doubt if Franklin D. Roosevelt ever read this resolution, or that he favors it or wants to assume the obligation contained therein.

Do not get the idea that I do not believe in embargoes on munitions of war. If I had the power, I would make it the law of our land that ammunition and munitions of war could never be sold or shipped from the United States to any nation on earth. Let them make their own preparations for war; let them beat their own plowshares into swords and their own pruning hooks into spears; but let us not for a few worthless, filthy dollars prepare them for their merciless and inhuman work. Over in the West the man who knowingly places the gun in the hands of a murderer is as guilty as he who sheds the blood. The Government of the United States, as far as I am concerned, can do away with all the great private factories that turn out implements of death and kindred things and perform its own necessary work in that respect at Government expense.

We send up a hypocritical cry for peace, and the peoples of the world look on and jeer as they see our ships covered with dollar marks bearing to the uttermost parts of the earth our munitions and wicked devices for the taking of human life.

No one is more devoted to the cause of peace than I am, and no one detests war more than I, but I believe with all my heart that we should be thoroughly prepared for war. So long as we live in such a time as we do, when the nations everywhere are preparing for war; so long as we are still in the jungles and still practice the old doctrine that might is right, I firmly believe that this country should be armed to the teeth—not for the purpose of quarreling with the world, but for the purpose of being ready should any nation come over here and quarrel with us.

When humanity finished its great western march and finally landed here on this rich and glorious land, bordered by the two great oceans of the world, here at the end of the great circular march they virtually found the fabulous pot of gold. Here they established a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people—a Government destined to be the light of the world. It is up to us to protect this great heritage against the enemies of humanity. Like hungry predatory animals sizing up their prey some nations are looking upon us with gnashing teeth, ready, and getting ready, to make the fatal move when it seems to them we are unprepared. This world is not run by Sunday-school methods and if we are wise, we will be prepared at all times for the iron and merciless heel of war. I am in favor of every move in the world that is calculated to bring about universal peace, but I do not believe in giving away my overcoat in the dead of winter; neither do I believe in scuttling our ships when other nations are building more.

If I had the power, I would start right now building airships and bombing planes, and I would continue to build them until we had planes enough to drive from our shores any nation, however strong, that might attack our land. Let me further say that if I had the power I would make a law so that wealth as well as man power would be conscripted in case of war. This would have a tendency to smother the spirit of war. I will extend in the RECORD parts of a speech of mine printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 5, 1917, the day before we entered the great World War, making the same a part of this speech. It here follows:

WAR WITH GERMANY

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I can see many reasons why we should not go into this war, but I am unable to see one reason why we should. Nothing was ever settled by war which could not have been settled better some other way. There never was a war that was not an indictment against the human race. If we must have war, it shows our weakness and depravity; it proves that we are still uncivilized and in the jungles.

I had hoped that our people were at least a little wiser than the other peoples of the world; that our goodly land, our high pretenses, and our hopes and fears had caused us to actually grow and burst the shell; but such is not the case, for it is decreed that we must abandon our high ambitions, extinguish our lights, call back our vanguards, turn around and take up the barbarous methods of the past. It is decreed that we abandon our dreams of peace and adopt the methods of the ancients and help make again the world a slaughter pen.

Today 14 of the great nations of the earth are engaged in a desperate war—more gigantic, more bloody and foolish, and more wicked than any of the wars that have preceded it. They are fighting people of their own kind, who kneel before the same shrine and worship the same God; they are apparently trying to exterminate the human race.

If all the money, energy, and human intelligence that have been expended in this war had been used for the benefit of humanity, it would have builded homes for all of the homeless wanderers on the face of the earth.

If a score of men were fighting in front of my house—fighting furiously with knives, clubs, and guns; striking wildly and all fighting madly for their lives—I would not think of standing around continually prodding the fighters about my rights. If I did, I would expect to get a broken nose or a nasty lick over the eye. Even if they staggered onto my radish patch, I would not at once challenge the whole bunch for a fight. No! I would get out of the war zone as quickly as possible, and later see them at their homes when the fight was over and they were no longer excited but were reasonable and cool, and I would ask them if they did not think they owed me something for tearing up my garden the day they had the scrap; and 10 chances to 1 they would pay me every cent I asked, and I would go away their friend.

I am perfectly devoted to the idea of keeping out of a war zone when a free-for-all fight is on.

Instead of encouraging this war, we should devote all of our wisdom, energy and skill in a gigantic effort to banish war forever from the face of the earth. It is necessary that we should do this, for war lowers our standards and threatens the very existence of humanity. It makes a mockery of our morality, a mockery of our humanity, a mockery of our religion, and a mockery of our God. It makes prayer sound like the mumuring of the feeble-minded. Why should human beings call on God for mercy when they will not show mercy to one another? Millions of men today are in the trenches of Europe on their knees praying to God for mercy, while at the same time they are looking over the embankments trying to blow out the brains of their fellow men. If our Creator is watching us at all, I wonder that He does not get tired of the whole proposition and blot out the human race. I wonder that He did not do so in the day of Darius. I wonder that He did not do so in the days of Alexander, and in the days of Napoleon, and I wonder more than ever why He does not do so now. Yes; blot out the human race and start all over again with upright beings that have mercy and humanity in their hearts.

If I were inclined to war—but I am not—I am sure I never could get the consent of my mind to vote my country into this present conflict. It is such a contagious, wicked, unheard of strife, without precedent in all the years of time.

It is estimated that 4,000,000 men have already been slain in this war. Someone who had computed it told me the other day that if all these dead were placed end to end a person could walk a distance equal to that from San Francisco to New York and return, stepping every foot of the way upon the bodies of the dead. It is also estimated that over 500,000 barrels of human blood has already been shed—shed in vain—for a cause unknown. The question is, Shall we get into this monstrous conflict and add a few thousand miles to the long rows of dead?

The rights denied us both by the Allies and the Central Powers are of a temporary nature. They will be suffered by us only during the existence of the war. The rifling of the mails and the blockade of the North Sea by England and the declaring of the war zone by Germany are in neither instance intended as an insult to us, but are the result of exigencies, as they claim, to which they have been driven in fighting for their existence and life.

I have no patience with any citizen of this country devoid of patriotism and reason who wants to go within the war zone. While three fourths of the world is prostrate with grief, and military law is generally in force and more than 30,000,000 men are on the battlefield, it is no hardship for me to remain at home.

I know a thousand young men in my district in the West who in case of war will volunteer and follow the flag, if necessary, into the very jaws of death. I do not want these faithful, thoughtful boys, sons of pioneers, who since they were 5 years of age have had sense enough to take shelter when the storm is on, to have to lay down their lives to avenge the loss of those who in search of trouble and new thrills ventured into this condemned zone of war. Neither am I concerned because during the remainder of the war the attitude of the belligerents will prevent, to a certain degree, the exportation of our goods. In view of the unheard-of high prices which now prevail, it is self-evident that more of our produce should be retained here in order to reduce the prices at home.

Another big reason why I am opposed to our becoming one of the belligerents is that not one man whom our soldiers will kill has had even a word to say in regard to bringing on the war, and not one in a hundred thousand who will fall before our guns will ever know the cause of the war in which they fought and died.

The saddest part of the whole thing is that when it is all over and the terms of peace are presented, the rulers of the nations will come out of seclusion with their families all intact—the same rulers who declared and brought on the war—and will treat together and arrange the terms of peace. They caused the war, and during its duration lived in luxury, suffered none of war's inconveniences, ate three good meals a day, and slept in downy beds at night, while the soldiers, innocent of its cause, fought, suffered, and died.

If we enter into this war, it is just a matter of killing a sufficient number of innocent men to convince the rulers of the Central Powers that in order to save their own unworthy heads it is time to stop.

Another reason why I do not favor this proposed war which the munition sellers and the bondholders propose to bring upon us is because the soldiers whom we will put to death will leave widows and children to mourn their loss. I never will believe that the honor of this people demands that we should flood the world with a countless horde of orphaned children.

We recently passed the child-labor law, preventing the little children of this country from being abused by working in manufacturing establishments and shops, but now it is demanded that we make war on the Central Powers, killing probably a million men in order to make the Kaiser sorry, and thereby leaving some 3,000,000 more fatherless children.

The two greatest agencies in the world are force and love. The effect of one is temporary, while the effect of the other is enduring. Force holds only while its power lasts. Love binds as if with cables and bands of steel. The father who rules his family with a rod of iron will soon lose his power, and, ridiculted and despised, will sit at last alone while the winter storms of age beat upon the roof of his abandoned home; while she who rules and draws by love, though her form is bowed beneath the weight of years, is the idol of her home and the inspiration of her children's children.

The government that holds the allegiance of its citizens only by an iron hand is ripe for revolution and is tottering on the brink of ruin, but the government that has the affection of its people is filled with patriotism and is in the morning of its long day.

The nation that holds its place by force among the nations of the world is only hastening to a fatal day when some other power will grow strong, dispute its rights, and take its place.

I will give you a human plan in which we can participate in this war, a plan which will not cost a life, a drop of blood, nor cause a tear to flow, save tears of gratitude and joy—that will not produce a moan, a sigh, a wrinkled face, or a broken heart.

This war will doubtless cost the United States at least $20,000,000,000. Let us dedicate 5 billions of this sum to humanity's cause, and with it relieve suffering instead of using it in a way that will produce more. Let us send $100,000,000 worth of food and clothing a year to each of the belligerent governments, to the Allies and to the Central Powers alike, a gift to the little children whose fathers and brothers have fallen or who are fighting in the war. Five billions used in this manner would last more than 3 years, probably to the end of the war. If so, we will save $15,000,000,000 to our people by the plan. Let us print, in their native tongues, on each package and garment sent the words, "The heart of America is bleeding for you."

Let each garment and food package also show a picture of the beautiful American flag, so that when the little fellows rise from their beds each morning they will clothe themselves with at least one garment, a token of mercy and kindness from far-away America, and when they eat their breakfasts they will see our flag and the inscription on the packages from which is secured their scanty supply.

Were we to follow this plan we would make both the giver and receiver glad. Were we to follow this humane, sympathetic plan, instead of the barbarous methods of war, America would soon become in reality the light of the world. Were we to adopt this method, in years to come, when the children of Europe are grown to be men, if some kaiser or war god should marshal his armies on the field of battle against us, the then warriors, being the children whom we now feed and clothe, when they saw that flag planted upon the ramparts of the enemy, would remember that they first saw it on their little jackets or food parcels sent them by a kind-hearted people across the sea, when fatherless and friendless, too sad even to cry, they sat alone. Do you think such an army would fire on that flag? No!

By force we can never make that flag permanently popular, but we can do so by acts of justice and affection. "Whosoever killeth by the sword must die by the sword."

I am sorry my country will not rise to this masterly occasion. I am sorry we are to throw down the weapons of humanity and take up the weapons of brutality.

Another reason why I am opposed to going into this war is because we have so much to lose and so little to gain.

We are not fighting for a principle, but to remove a condition. We are simply angry with the Kaiser, and we propose to get into the war and kill a few million quiet, friendly Germans in order to show the Kaiser how mad we are.

Today the United States is the only great neutral power on earth. It stands aloof and alone. It stands just where it ought to stand. For 140 years we have declared our form of government to be the light of the world—that our position among the nations is that of a brother—that we are not here to slaughter them, but to do the other nations good. Let us maintain our position and keep our course, for the hour of our supreme usefulness is at hand. Soon the poor, foolish, struggling, bleeding, and dying nations will need the helping hand of a great, just, and powerful friend to lift them to their feet and steady them while they learn to stand alone.

It is an easy matter to get into trouble, but sometimes a very hard matter to get out of it.

When we go into this war we are 100,000,000 happy people, but what will we be when we come out? When we enter it our stores and warehouses are full. How will it be when we come out? When we go in, the grass has grown for years upon the graves of our honored dead. How will it be when we come out? When we go into this war, empty sleeves and sightless eyes are almost unknown. How will it be after the struggle? When we go into it, crutches and widows' tears are out of date. How will it be when we come out? When we go in, we are heavily laden with honor and are recognized as being the light of the world. How will it be when we come out?

Today we are the only great neutral nation. This ought to be more sacred to us than was the Ark of the Covenant to ancient Israel. To whom are we going to surrender our privileges for humanity when we sell our birthright for a mess of war pottage? Will China or some one of the neutral South American Republics take our place?

I am unwilling to enter this war, for by so doing we will unite with the Allies, espouse their causes, and be obliged to fight until their causes, as well as our own, are won. The American people, in my judgment, are not ready to form such an entangling alliance, against which we were warned by George Washington. Neither are they ready to help England, France, Italy, Russia, and Japan win their causes. We have not passed on the proposition as to who is right—the Allies or the Central Powers. Neither do we intend to, for it is none of our business. Let us beware lest in settling our own good cause we help settle also the causes of others that are bad.

We have but to go back to the Spanish-American War to find an example of how two nations were grossly wronged by the same agencies that are now at work bringing on another war.

John Sherman, Secretary of State during the Spanish-American War, made the following statement in a public address at his home in Mansfield, Ohio, at a reception given in his honor just before he retired as Secretary of State:

"Had not the War with Spain been declared when it was, we could have secured by treaty with Spain all that we demanded."

The United States Government in 1903 published a Report of the Foreign Relations of the United States for a period that included the diplomatic negotiations preceding the War with Spain. This report shows that on February 26, 1898, the American minister to Spain, Gen. Stewart L. Woodford, wrote to President McKinley that he had obtained the "practical adjustment of every problem" that had been entrusted to him. On April 3, 1898, Minister Woodford cabled to President McKinley as follows:

"If conditions at Washington still enable you to give me the necessary time, I am sure that before next October I will get peace in Cuba with justice to Cuba and protection to our great American interests. I know that the Queen and her ministry sincerely desire peace, and that if you can give me time and reasonable liberty of action I will get for you the peace you desire so much and for which you have labored so hard."

Just a few days before we declared war Minister Woodford again cabled President McKinley on April 19, repeating the foregoing sentiments and adding:

"I hope that nothing will be done to humiliate Spain, as I am satisfied that the present government is going and is loyally ready to go as fast and as far as it can. With your power of action, sufficiently free, you will win the fight on your own lines."

Yet on April 19 Congress ordered armed intervention in Cuba and 3 days later adopted a resolution in which it declared that "war exists."

What a shame to the American people that a war was unnecessarily declared, which resulted in the death of 6,305 officers and enlisted men, wherein hundreds of millions of dollars were spent, when the matter could have been settled by ink and pen.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to declaring war on Germany for the further reason that, in my judgment, 98 percent of the people of the United States are against such a declaration. On January 31, 1916, I introduced House Joint Resolution 138, which provided for a change of article I, section 8, division 11 of the Constitution of the United States, which section defines the powers of Congress to declare war. Congress has the power at present to declare war whenever it shall see fit. I seek by this resolution to restrict this power, and have provided in the proposed amendment that Congress shall have the power to declare war in cases of invasion or threatened invasion of the United States or any of its insular possessions by a foreign power, or in cases of insurrection or revolution within the United States or any of its insular possessions, and in other cases where the matter of declaring war has been submitted to the people and a majority of those voting have declared themselves in favor of the proposed war. In other words, Congress shall have the right to declare war only in cases of emergency. In all other cases it shall be left to the people.

Mr. Speaker, I consider this scheme the solution of the whole war proposition. The people of one nation seldom, if ever, want to fight the people of another nation. It is the rulers of nations that bring on war. President Wilson, in his Chicago speech several months ago, said: "Rulers, not public opinion, brought on the present war in Europe." He could, with the same degree of truthfulness, have said that nine tenths of all the wars that have come in the past have been brought on by the rulers, instead of by the public sentiment of the people. The rulers of our country here in Washington, changing as they frequently do every 2, 4, or 6 years, are just as apt to mistake newspaper agitation for public sentiment and bring on war as are the rulers of other lands. Remove the power of the President and Congress to bring on war, except in cases of invasion, threatened invasion, revolution, or threatened revolution, and nine tenths of the danger of war will pass.

Congress, which now has the constitutional power to bring on war, is composed of Senators and Representatives who are exempt from war. This is a wise provision, for most of them would be a hindrance on the battlefield. In case of a charge, they would hardly escape being run over by the Red Cross, the newspaper boys, and the commissary department.

Our present plan is neither safe nor fair. I hear much about the honor of our country, and I believe the honor of this country should be maintained; but I want to see the term "honor" defined by the men who have to maintain it.

I should not like to have some fat fellow define my honor, tell me when it had been assailed, and shove me into a fight.

No man should have to be a factor in his country's defense in time of war who was not a factor on election day in determining whether there should be war.

War so vitally affects every citizen that I think every citizen should have a right to express his views as to whether there should be war. War is the most important of all subjects. Why should not the people decide it?

Why should not the interested parties pass upon that which is to them the most interesting of all subjects? Do we not believe that the people should rule? Do we mean that this is a government wherein the people shall decide matters of minor importance, but when it comes to deciding whether we shall have war, the greatest and most important of all questions, that the people are not qualified to decide? As human blood and human life are of more importance than all other considerations, so the question of war is of more importance than all other subjects.

During all the history of the world, small minorities have been declaring wars for the majorities to fight. The men who fought the battles of olden times fought not for a cause but for their kings. Today the same old system prevails, and now the armies of Europe fight not for a sacred cause but for their kaiser, their emperor, their king, or czar.

Fighting, bleeding, and dying for a cause to them unknown! It is now proposed that a handful of rulers here, who really ought to be the servants of the people, but who will not be if they declare war, shall follow the example of the rulers of Europe and pry this country over into the seething hell of war.

For one I am not in favor of it. I am in favor in this people's Government of letting the people decide whether they want war or not. I am in favor of letting the mothers and fathers who will furnish the fuel decide whether this wildfire shall be started. I am in favor of letting the men whose country will be imperiled, whose blood will be spilt, and whose lives will be lost in case of war have a chance to say whether there shall be war. I am in favor of hearing from the poor fellow who, in case of war, will die in the trenches, from the fellows who will have their eyes shot away, who will wear empty sleeves and go on crutches for the rest of their lives. I do not care so much about hearing from a few fat bondholders as I do the young, lean fellows who will have to stand, and who are willing to stand, if necessary, like a granite wall, and face without a quiver the fiery hell of war. Before this war is deliberately declared, as long as there is plenty of time, I want to hear from the firesides and thresholds that will be saddened and ruined in case of war. I know how the people feel who are going to profit in case of war, but I want to know for sure how the people feel who will defray its expenses. For the sake of the result of the war I want the voters of this country to have a voice in declaring the war, for when this great people decide for war, their cause every time will be just.

Do not decide against this plan because it is something new. Remember that this is a new age. Progress beckons from the mountain tops. Our best ideas have not yet found their way into books. Humanity has come up from the stone age step by step over the long and weary way. Remember the absurdities of yesterday are the accepted truths of today.

Let me call your attention to the fact again that the people of one country scarcely, if ever, want to fight the people of another country. Had the peoples of the belligerent countries been consulted, this war would never have been fought; if we were to take the time now—and we have lots of time, for it never does any harm to postpone a fight—and let the people speak by ballot, America will not become a factor in this hideous strife.

The old system has caused as many drops of blood to be shed along the Mediterranean as there are drops of water in the sea; it has caused as many teardrops as there are drops of water in the Amazon; it has reduced to putrid flesh, grinning skeletons, and to bleached and withered bones, the youth and flower of every age and land; it has disgusted humanity with itself, made religion a farce, prayer a mockery, and by universal consent closed the windows of heaven to mankind; it has caused the chief occupation of man to be the shedding of his neighbor's blood and made implements of husbandry secondary to implements of death; it has caused the soldiers to be superior to the tiller of the soil and the army officer to be regarded head and shoulders above his fellow man; it has caused human sympathy to become dry at the fountain and has turned the heart of man to stone; it has outraged decency and morality and caused mankind to fall below the level of the beast, and the brutal iron and hell of war have trampled without regret the noblest inspirations of the human heart.

I submit that it is time to get rid of war, or it will get rid of us. It is an unwelcome visitor, and I want to make it impossible for it to reach our shores. I want to make it a stranger and drive it to the uttermost parts of the earth. I will never be willing to pursue it as some desire across the sea. I want to remove it as far from us as the east is from the west. I want to put thorns and thistles in its pathway. I want to make its way devious and uncertain. I want to throw up barriers against it, mountain ranges, trackless deserts, oceans, and continents between my native land and war.

It has been said that the devil is the cause of all our earthly woes. Mankind is the cause of war, and in bringing woes upon ourselves we have outdeviled the devil. We certainly have made the devil feel silly. We have discounted him at his own game of bringing misery.

All power in government rests with the people. In some instances they delegate their power to a few men, but the important matters they refuse to delegate. For instance, we do not delegate to our State legislators in California the power to change the State constitution. That must be done only by a vote of the people of the State. We will not permit our State legislators to vote a bond issue upon the State. That power has not been delegated. It is of so much importance that we refuse to let it go out of our hands. If the change of a State constitution or the voting of a bond issue is so important that the people have refused to delegate the power to its representatives, why should we delegate to the President and a little over 500 men here in Washington the power to declare war? War is of as much more importance than all other things as human blood is more precious than oats or corn. War may mean the death of 10,000,000 men; it may mean 10,000,000 children made fatherless, 10,000,000 wives made widows; it may mean every dollar taken from the Treasury; and it may mean the lowering of our flag.

It astounds me to think that in spite of the fact that Jesus of Nazareth, the founder of the Christian religion, declared in His Sermon on the Mount, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God", yet an element of the American people revile those who lift up their voices against war, and certain moral cowards try to make it appear that he who in this fateful hour prefers peace to war is a traitor to the country in which he lives.

In conclusion let me say that I am sorry we are not far enough from the jungles to take the right course. I am sorry we have to matriculate again in the tedious university of time. Some nation in the future will rise. I know not when or where will be its seat of power. I fondly trust it will be here in our goodly land. That nation, like Saul, the son of Kish, will stand head and shoulders above all around. It will be a nation of destiny; its purpose to uplift the human race. Its people will be just and wise; excitement will not sweep them off their feet. In that nation there will be no assumption of power. The legislators there will fear no whip, but guided by what they feel is right will bow their heads only to duty's call. There will be no war gods there, no thirsting for human blood, and newspapers will be the servants of the people's will. Before that day comes republics like our own may crumble a hundred times. No one can tell, but until it does come this world will not be a fit place in which to live. Humanity will finally learn its lesson. Humanity must finally win.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this resolution because I consider it a menace to peace. I am such a firm advocate of peace that I twice went to war in behalf of peace. I volunteered in the Spanish-American War and served in it, and in the World War I was sent to France and served 28 months in the First Division and in the Air Service. While I was overseas at the cemetery of Romaine, I saw where 22,800 of our American men were buried, and the thought came to me that these men were lying there on the written approval of the man who was elected to keep the United States out of war. We are now confronted with the same situation. Our President might be just as well disposed toward peace as I am, but in this resolution there is a potential opportunity for him to send your sons and my sons to invade a foreign soil, and if the resolution is not amended to provide that under no condition, shape, or form will the American citizen be called upon by draft to send his sons and daughters to a foreign soil to maintain the resolution, then I shall be against it. If it is so amended, I may be a bit receptive to the thought of agreeing to it. But it is a menace to peace as it is, and I am absolutely opposed to it. What do we find? For instance, England is spending more money than she did last year on her Navy, and what are we doing? We are putting ourselves in the possible position of again being engaged in war, yet we are reducing our Navy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three quarters of a minute.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I just want to read an item from an editorial:

> Don't encourage unconstitutional performances and create unconstitutional precedents. Be one of the coequal branches of the American Government.

As Congressmen, we should exercise independence and equality which the Constitution gives us. Do not give it to somebody else. I pledge allegiance to my flag and country and not to any dictator. Presidents and dictators may come and go, but I hope the flag will remain forever. I speak for the youth of this country. Do not engage yourself in any compact at this time which will inevitably lead to war. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, to remove all suspicion of partisanship from what I have to say, I direct the attention of the House to certain remarks which I made on the floor of the House on February 22 last, and which may be found in the RECORD of that date. At that time I attacked the then administration, charging that its foreign policy was dominated by the British Foreign Office and by alien interests. [Applause.] I made the following statement:

> The administration to be inducted into office on March 4 will suffer the same character of defeat as did the present administration if it, too, fails to adhere to the sound American policy of not interfering or participating in the political affairs of Europe and of maintaining at all times American neutrality; if it, too, fails to adopt and to adhere to an American policy, not a European policy.

I had then no knowledge or idea that one of the first acts of the present administration would be to come here and to offer such a resolution as we now have before us. This resolution, in my opinion—and I should have said so as emphatically during the last administration as I say it now—is a disloyal betrayal of American interests, of the American foreign policy of 140 years, and of the spirit and purpose of the Federal Constitution. It proposes to involve us in the affairs of the world in a dangerous and perilous way; it proposes to give to the President of the United States dictatorial powers, such powers as no one individual within these United States should have or ever has had. Even Hitler would not have dared to demand of the Reichstag for himself the sole power of making war. Is the American Executive to out-Hitler Hitler? Are American institutions and American traditions to be abolished?

This resolution puts into the hands of the President of the United States not only the right to select the so-called "aggressor nation", to pick the nation into whose affairs he wishes to intervene in a hostile way, but also the power actually to make war. Neutrality is the impartial attitude of one nation toward two or more nations which are at war. An arms embargo is an unneutral and hostile act, and in international law it can be followed by reprisals and even by declaration of war by the aggrieved nation. The resolution gives the President the right to intervene in any conflict in a military sense and to make the United States a party to a war whether declared or undeclared.

The resolution permits the President and not the Congress to make the enemies and friends of the United States; it gives the President, instead of the Congress, the power to make war. The resolution proposes that one man, with such prejudices as he may have, subject to such influences as an individual may be—and the President is mortal and in mortal mold constructed—shall have that supreme power of making war. When that is done the safety of the United States is put in the greatest peril, a vital and fatal attack is made upon the safeguards of the Constitution under which we are here assembled.

It has been said repeatedly that this resolution in no way involves Japan. How that can be said with the existing records, from which I shall read to you, is difficult to understand. I do not charge bad faith, but I do say there has been a concealment, that there is a concealment, when it is stated this resolution does not involve Japan. I will prove conclusively that it does.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. In confirmation of that, when did this thing start? It was January 6, was it not? This whole business started January 6, and it was started by the old administration at that time.

Mr. TINKHAM. At about that time.

Let me read from this official document, marked "Department of State, Press Releases, Saturday, March 4, 1933. Sino-Japanese Situation."

Following is the text of a resolution adopted at the special meeting of the Assembly of the League of Nations on February 24, 1933:

"Whereas, in virtue of article III, paragraph 3, of the Covenant, the Assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter affecting the peace of the world, and therefore cannot regard with indifference the development of the Sino-Japanese dispute;

"And whereas, according to part IV, section 3, of the report adopted by the Assembly, in virtue of article XV, paragraph 4, the members of the League 'intend to abstain from taking any isolated action with regard to the situation in Manchuria and to continue to concert their action among themselves as well as with the interested states not members of the League' and 'in order to facilitate as far as possible the establishment in the Far East of a situation in conformity with the recommendations of the present report, the secretary general is instructed to communicate a copy of this report to the states nonmembers of the League who are signatories of or have acceded to the Pact or Paris or of the 9-power treaty, informing them of the assembly's hope that they will associate themselves with the views expressed in the report, and that they will, if necessary, concert their action and their attitude with the members of the League';

"The Assembly decides to appoint an advisory committee to follow the situation, to assist the Assembly in performing its duties under article III, paragraph 3, and, with the same objects, to aid the members of the League in concerting their action and their attitude among themselves and with the nonmember states.

"The committee will consist of the members of the Committee of Nineteen and the representatives of Canada and the Netherlands.

"The committee will invite the Governments of the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to cooperate in its work.

"It shall report and make proposals to the Assembly whenever it thinks fit. It shall also communicate its reports to the governments of the states nonmembers of the League which are cooperating in its work.

"The Assembly shall remain in session and its President, after consulting the committee, may convene it whenever he thinks fit."

The American Minister at Geneva now sits on that committee.

If you wish further evidence that this resolution does involve Japan, let me reach a despatch from Geneva, dated February 26, 1933, printed in the London Times:

The general conviction in Geneva is that an embargo can only be applied against Japan, the party to the dispute which is defying the League. Before appointing or instructing a subcommittee the committee will probably wait for the reply of the United States to the invitation to cooperate in its work. A similar invitation has gone to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The League has already received a very encouraging reply from the United States Secretary of State to the letter of February 24, in which the Government of the United States was asked to associate itself with the views expressed in the report of the Assembly, and, if necessary, to concert its action and attitude with the members of the League.

On the same page of the London Times appeared this dispatch, from New York, also dated February 26:

The reply of Mr. Stimson, the Secretary of State, to the invitation to declare the attitude of his Government toward the report of the Committee of Nineteen on Manchuria, was sent only after Mr. Stimson had communicated with Mr. Roosevelt, the President-elect, and had conferred on far eastern and other problems with Senator Cordell Hull, who is to be his successor.

The League invitation reached the State Department while Mr. Stimson and Mr. Hull were in conference and was not brought to Mr. Stimson's attention at that time, but the President-elect's support of Mr. Hoover's far eastern policy was so clearly indicated then by Mr. Hull that it was not necessary for Mr. Stimson to seek any new assurance that his reply was in accordance with Mr. Roosevelt's views.

If there is still any doubt in the mind of any Member of this House that this resolution does not involve Japan, let me read an article which appeared in the New York Times of March 5 headed "Reminder by Lord Cecil." The article reads as follows:

Now that the Nanking Government, in objecting to the embargo placed on arms and munitions going to China and Japan, has asked the League of Nations to name the aggressor nation in the Sino-Japanese undeclared war, adhesion to a League project for the support of the nation acting on the defensive is incumbent on the United States, according to Viscount Cecil, who, in a letter to the Times of London, says:

"On January 11 the Democratic President-elect of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt, said:

"'I have long been in favor of the use of embargoes on arms to belligerent nations, especially to nations which are guilty of making an attack on other nations * * * that is, against aggressor nations.'

"Just a month later there was published in Washington a memorandum by the Republican Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, addressed to the Foreign Affairs Committee of Congress. It was in support of a resolution authorizing the President to associate with other nations in an arms embargo against belligerent nations, and it included the following statement:

"'If the League of Nations or any other comprehensive group of important States had mutually arrived at such a verdict [that is, a verdict that one of the belligerent nations was the aggressor] the participation of the United States in a general arms embargo would be not merely practical and sound, but practically necessary to preserve our national dignity and standing as a peaceful Nation.'

"These very important pronouncements make it clear that both parties in the United States stand for participation in an arms embargo against an aggressor state and that the Republican Secretary of State declares that in this connection a decision by the League of Nations as to which is the aggressor is, for practical purposes, conclusive."

If the House is not yet satisfied on this point, let me read another dispatch from Geneva, dated March 27, printed in the Washington Post. It reads:

The United States will be expected to participate in a world arms embargo against Japan, to be declared as a result of her withdrawal from the League of Nations, it was indicated here tonight.

The smaller powers very likely will demand immediate economic sanctions, or penalties, delegates believed, together with the withdrawal of ambassadors and ministers in Japan.

I think these dispatches, together with the release from the State Department which I read first to the House show conclusively that the purpose of the resolution is to cooperate with the League of Nations in enforcing article XVI, the war clause, of the Covenant of the League. It was principally because of this article, together with article X, which guarantees the territorial boundaries of the members of the League, that the United States refused to join the League.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Did not the gentleman visit the Secretary of State, Mr. Hull, and talk about this matter? And was he not assured that Japan was not in mind at all? Is this true or not?

Mr. TINKHAM. It is not true. I saw Mr. Green, who represented the State Department before the Foreign Affairs Committee in support of the resolution, and he showed me certain despatches from Mr. Wilson, who is acting as our member upon the so-called "advisory committee."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Did the gentleman see Mr. Hull?

Mr. TINKHAM. I did not see Mr. Hull.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I did not know that.

Mr. TINKHAM. I wish to say to this House that when Mr. Stimson supported this proposal during the last Congress, he did not represent the Republican Party, and he did not truly represent the American people, and I say that the present administration is not truly representing the American people now in this matter.

I wish to say to this House also that we are not going to interfere in the political affairs of other nations if I and those members of the Democratic Party and of the Republican Party who also are real Americans—I use the term advisedly—can prevent it; we are not going to pick the aggressor, to use force, embargoes, and sanctions, and to make war. We are going to stay on this American Continent in peace. We are going to maintain the neutrality which gave us peace, prosperity, and national integrity, and which preserved our institutions until we went to war in Europe, in violation of that salutary policy—not for our own ends but for the ends of others. The present bankruptcy of our people and the tottering of our institutions have their roots in that mad adventure.

Let us be Americans and attend to America's affairs, having first in mind the interest of America. If we can help the world by acts of conciliation, by advice, by good offices, or by assistance short of embargoes, short of sanctions, short of coercion, short of force, short of war, well and good. When it is proposed that we make use of embargoes, of sanctions, of coercion, of force, of war, as it is proposed in this resolution, I say there is proposed the entire repudiation of American philosophy and American ideals, and that the complete destruction of America itself and of our civilization will inevitably follow. [Applause.]

Mr. TINKHAM. With unanimous consent, will not the honorable Representative from New York allow me to extend and correct my remarks?

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is rather unusual for anyone to object to a request of this kind, but I do not see why I should be discriminated against by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], who objected to my putting in a few letters.

This is the first time in over 10 years of service in this House that I have objected to anything. I do not think it is right that I should be selected as the one to be discriminated against in a matter of this kind.

Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will be kind enough to withdraw his objection as far as my request is concerned, I shall be very pleased to allow anyone to insert anything he wishes in the RECORD; but why should my request be objected to and the requests of others not be objected to?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. My objection carried with it nothing personal at all.

Mr. BLOOM. I know that; that is not in my mind.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I believe every individual Member should have the right to extend his own remarks, but the gentleman from New York well knows that it is not the custom to extend in the RECORD letters from various people who write to the Members.

Mr. BLOOM. I simply wanted to print a very few of them. I told the gentleman I had received many letters, but the ones I wanted to include in the RECORD were very few and the letters are very short. It is rather disrespectful to the people who wrote to me, to have this request denied. They are not constituents of mine. The letters are from all parts of the country, and I do not see why the gentleman should object to them when everybody else has been allowed to print anything they wanted.

I dislike to object to the pending request and I may say that I shall not object, but it rather hurts me to think that I should be discriminated against in this way.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw any objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, may I at this time withdraw my objection to the request which the gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH] made a few minutes ago.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks as indicated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ROGERS] such time as he may desire.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, regardless of what the opposition has said or may say, the resolution we are discussing is a peace proposal. It is a measure that, when functioning properly, will not only aid in stabilizing peace in our own country, but will help to stazilize the peace of the entire world.

I favor this proposition because I am interested in the peace and prosperity of our country, and I believe that we should support any proposal designed to keep our country's peace when other nations are at war.

Two thousands years ago Christ came and dwelt among men, preaching and teaching, "Peace on the earth, justice, and good will toward all men." The angels took up the refrain and it has been chanted far and wide. Many men and many women have labored to further Christ's work, to establish peace in all the world, justice and good will toward all men. But some men and some women, in fashioning their lives, have not heeded the teachings of our Savior. And some nations have dared to trample in the dust that gospel taught by the Master. But many nations have been formed with that doctrine as their motto, and their banners have floated on high proclaiming, "In all the world peace, toward all men justice and good will." Chief among the nations that have been guided by the principles of peace, justice, and good will is our own dear United States of America. She has been the apostle of peace since the days of Bunker Hill, she has taught the doctrine of justice since the formation of our great Union, she has lived the gospel of good will since the signing of the Declaration of Independence; for never once has she waged an aggressive struggle, never once has she fought for the spoils of war, never once has she shed blood for any other purpose than in defense of the principles, "Peace on the earth, justice and good will toward all men." She has never been the offender, but always the defender of that policy, and I have faith in her to believe that she will always continue to tread the path that has been worn smooth by her footsteps.

But in order for America to carry on, in order for us to make her future a credit to her illustrious past we must not forget the principles that have guided her destiny in the past and must continue to guide her in the future. We must not lose our opportunity to assist the other nations of the world in establishing that condition for which we have ever labored—peace, justice, and good will in all the world toward all men.

Mr. Speaker, and ladies and gentlemen of this House, under the provisions of this resolution, the power granted could only be used if it was found to be necessary. Naturally, the authority given here to place an embargo upon the citizens of this country would not be exercised unless it would be effective toward establishment of peace in some other country, and it would be effective then only if the leading nations of the world, wherein arms are manufactured, entered into such an agreement. Are we of that number who, having eyes, see not the things that so vitally affect us? Can gentlemen read? If so do they not see that this embargo, if placed, could be raised by the President, or Congress, at any time when it was deemed necessary?

Finally, ladies and gentlemen, this resolution was recommended by ex-President Hoover and his State Department and is now recommended by President Roosevelt and his State Department, and we are convinced that it is a measure that will assist in stabilizing the peace of the entire world. Then let each of us do our part. Let us pass this measure, remembering the gospel laid down by the Master, "Peace on the earth, good will toward all men."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, as I have listened to this debate it has been impressed on my mind that this resolution cannot be considered solely from the standpoint of precedent, that it cannot be considered solely on its own merits, but must be considered in connection with the world-peace movement.

From the standpoint of precedent it is objected that this grant of power to the President by permanent legislation to place an embargo on the shipment of arms and munitions of war to a country or countries engaged or about to become engaged in war is without precedent. It is answered that the responsible ministries of all the other principal powers now have this authority, but cannot exercise it without our cooperation. The objectors come back with the reply that these ministries are subject to immediate recall in the event they run counter to what is considered the national safety, while the President of the United States is in power for a fixed term. This is not a sufficient reason for discrimination between the fixed powers of the President and the powers of foreign ministries for the reason that if a foreign ministry declares an embargo the harm, so-called, has already been done and the nation involved. This distinction between the different characters of official tenures is too fine to alone demand the withholding of the power from the President.

It may be further pointed out that the action of Congress in 1911 in granting the President continuing power to lay an embargo upon the export of arms and munitions to any American country in which conditions of domestic violence exist was at that time without precedent, and, further, that the placing of such an embargo is fully as potential of war between this country and the country against which the embargo is placed as under the proposed grant of power. Why, for instance, may not other American countries in which conditions of domestic violence exist consider the placing of an embargo by this Government as a hostile act?

The same reasoning applies even more strongly to the legislation of 1922 granting the President permanent power to place embargoes against countries in which this country exercises what is called "extraterritorial jurisdiction", such jurisdiction consisting merely of a court with limited powers set up in a foreign capital, at this time in China, Arabia, Egypt, Morocco, and Ethiopia. Under the act of 1922, and resting upon this mere fiction of right, an embargo was placed against China, the most populous nation of the earth, and a friendly nation, which is still in force. The act of 1922 was also without a precedent. No war has yet resulted from the many exercises of these powers.

Mr. Dooley once observed, in criticizing an American statesman who was very much given to the citation of Washington and Jefferson, that we could not go to the graveyard for all our precedents. Those great leaders dealt with the problems of their day in the light of existing conditions. They had no precedents. They had to blaze new trails. And so today this country is confronted, and the world is confronted, with conditions for which there are no precedents, and workable solutions must be found if we are to place the peace of the world upon a stable basis.

The first recorded question—Am I my brother's keeper?—finds its latest answer in the fast narrowing limits of a no-longer isolated world. This Nation and every nation is its brother's keeper. Such a violent disturbance as war upsets the whole terrestrial order. A war anywhere finds its repercussions everywhere.

This brings us to the other aspect of the question now before the House, its relation to the whole peace program of the world, for the inception of which we do not have to go back beyond the memory of living men. The Hague Tribunal, established as recently as 1899, may be called the first feeble beginning of a world movement against war and for the settlement of difficulties between the nations by peaceful means. Had its objectives been realized, the World War might never have occurred. The fault was not in the agency.

Since the World War the prevention of war has become not only a world issue, but the paramount international issue of the world. It has been magnified a thousandfold. It gave birth to the League of Nations, to the World Court, to the Nine Power Pact, and to the Briand-Kellogg Treaty, renouncing war as a national policy, outlawing war; and now to the arms conference.

We are too close in time to that greatest of human dramas, the World War, to evaluate its results. It is too early to ridicule it as the war to end war. One of these instrumentalities for world peace has just given expression to an act without precedent. Its forty-odd adherent nations have investigated the origin of a war and have named the aggressor nation. This action is historic. It was participated in by England, which is charged by critics of this resolution with the authorship of the resolution. England would hide behind our skirts. Let it be said for England that she did not hide behind our skirts in determining and proclaiming the aggressor nation.

Gentlemen declare on the floor that the passage of this resolution will mean war with Japan, and within 30 days. Let me say that the gravest error this country could make in dealing with the Asiatic situation would be to take counsel of its fears. Although then a private citizen and out of sympathy with the administration, I applauded the courage and incision of the notes issued by Secretary Stimson on the Asiatic situation. They had the ring of the note of President Cleveland on the Venezuelan boundary dispute, the one act of his two administrations which gave him a permanent claim to fame. There may be ways out of the question mark which overhangs the Pacific, but fear is not one of them.

There is nothing of the pacifist in my support of this resolution. I am for preparedness up to the full measure of the National Defense Act of 1920 and the London Naval Treaty. That program is my way out, until such time as all the powers can be brought to a genuine program of disarmament. So far as the immediate object of the fears of the opponents of this resolution is concerned, it has been pointed out that China, a great and friendly power, and handicapped by lack of war supplies, is now under the disability of the embargo, while Japan is practically self-sufficient in the matter of supplying her own arms and munitions, and certainly of supplying what she needs against China, and is thus neither handicapped nor aggrieved. If an embargo was laid against the materials of which arms and munitions are made, I am advised a different question might be presented.

Are the people of the United States less devoted to the establishment of world peace than the other nations of the earth? Has it less courage than these nations? Is it still so obsessed with the fantasy of an imaginary isolation that it will refuse cooperation with these nations? The enactment of this resolution is but a single item on the world program for international peace, for which all civilized peoples are earnestly striving.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, in the remaining 2 minutes of the time belonging to the minority I send a statement to the Clerk's desk and ask that it may be read in my time. It is an article from the leading Democratic campaigner in the recent national election.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Extract from a front-page editorial entitled "Eternal Vigilance Is the Price of Liberty", which appeared on Sunday, April 2, 1933, in the Hearst newspapers:

"* * * It [the administration] is considering the exercise of dictatorial powers to declare embargoes and so incur the danger of involving this country in the Chino-Japanese war. Only Congress has the right to declare war, and Congress should not surrender the right to make war or to provoke war. As a matter of fact, both the Congress and the President should keep out of Asiatic complications. Both the Congress and the President should keep free from foreign entanglements. There are other ways of making history for themselves which are better and safer than involving our peaceful country in the wars of the whole world.

"* * * It is poor patriotism to risk the peace and welfare of the United States in quarrels and complications which are in no sense ours. And, finally, it is the poorest kind of politics to alienate from the Democratic Party the support of that vast body of genuine Americans who think more of the interests of their own country than they do of the selfish plans and purposes of foreign nations.

"* * * All the administration need do is obstinately to proceed to meddle in foreign complications to the danger and detriment of our own American people. * * * If the President is not alarmed by this possibility, the Democrats in Congress should be. It would be their funeral. And if the Democrats in Congress do not wish to precipitate the funeral, they would better retain their common sense and be Democrats and be Americans before the funeral occurs. Furthermore, it is not good democracy and it is not good Americanism for the Congress of the United States to transfer its constitutional powers to any President, no matter how capable and conscientious that President may be. The Senators and Representatives who constitute the Congress were elected to be Senators and Representatives, and themselves to exercise the powers and obligations which the Constitution imposes upon them. If they are incapable of doing that, they would better let the people elect a Congress which has the courage and competence to exercise its constitutional powers, and to be one of the three coequal branches of the Government which the Constitution created. * * *"

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to speak by the record, especially by the record of some of the gentlemen who have fought this bill so hard.

In this discussion they have turned loose on us the most distinguished gentlemen on their side, and I first refer to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK]. We all know that he is a great lawyer, that he is a man of great parts, and that he came to this Congress with the reputation of being a great constitutional lawyer. We all greatly respect him and his ability. On the occasion of his first one or two speeches in the House the Democrats listened very attentively because we felt at that time that perhaps he would discuss these questions upon purely constitutional grounds, but of recent days we have found that this distinguished gentleman, as to constitutional or nonconstitutional arguments, has always been able to see them from the Republican standpoint. Not only this, but the gentleman comes before the House in this attitude, and while Democrats at first had great respect for his opinion they have now learned that like the shrewd lawyer he is he discusses questions from a partisan standpoint. I am glad, however, that he made one admission, because the gentleman who filed a report here first claimed that what we are undertaking to do is an unconstitutional act.

You know that when you first started to practice law you heard the old statement, first win on the facts, and if you cannot win on the facts get the jury, and if you cannot get the facts or the jury try "unconstitutional." But this distinguished gentleman, knowing that our constitutional position was well taken, merely said that it violated the spirit of the Constitution.

Then we had the distinguished ex-Senator from New York, whom we are proud to have in our body. We recognize his ability and we are honored to have him on this floor. In his argument he said that if you pass this bill it will be up to the United States of America, if you declare an embargo, to declare a blockade against the country upon which we declare the embargo.

How this resolution can be construed in that way I am unable to say. All this resolution provides is that it makes it a crime for any of our citizens to violate the resolution in shipping arms or munitions to a country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My idea was that by force of circumstances this embargo would grow to be equivalent to a blockade—that once you started it you could not stop it.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is the same argument that has been made before. I charge that an embargo is not a declaration of war, that it is not taking away the power from Congress. The President of the United States in a dozen different ways could bring on war and Congress would have to declare it. He could do it by speech or he could do it by diplomatic relations.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, my friend Mr. TINKHAM, is greatly disturbed in regard to Japan.

I thought that he had gone to the Secretary of State's office. I know that the gentleman from New York, the ranking Member on the committee, Mr. FISH, had gone, and I knew that he had information and that the resolution could not be construed as having any reference to Japan. The purpose of this resolution is for the peace of the world. That is the purpose of it. If it is to lead us into war, pray tell us why the munition workers who profit by war are the only ones who were heard against the resolution in the committee.

But my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. FISH] is evidently backsliding a little as you will see by his former stand.

I happen to know what he has been standing for. Let me call your attention to that. On January 7, 1928, he introduced a joint resolution in this House declaring against the shipment of arms and munitions to any country providing that the resolution shall not apply to any American country or any country in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction.

If that bill of his had become a law the President could have issued a proclamation establishing an embargo against Japan. Is not that true?

In a few days he introduced another resolution of the same character. I said he was backsliding. Let us see about the speech he made to the League of Women Voters in Buffalo, N.Y., April 27, 1924. What did he say in that speech?

There is one solution to the peace problem. I believe that the entrance of the United States into the World Court would be a step in that direction.

Further, he now says this is a step toward taking us into the League of Nations. Let us hear from Mr. FISH further when he made this statement on May 24, 1924:

I agree with everything that Senator Owen has said except as to entering the League of Nations at this time. I believe myself in the principles of the League of Nations at this time, and I believe some time in the future we should go into the League with reservation.

That was Mr. FISH speaking at that time. Further, he has a peace record. Here on the floor of this House, in answer to his present argument, let me read from him again:

Mr. Speaker, this resolution is more far-reaching than would appear at first glance. It is one of the most important measures that will come before Congress at this session.

He was referring there to the proposed embargo against everybody.

I, for one, feel that if we go ahead and pass this resolution it will put an end to all the talk in foreign countries that we are nothing but a slaughterhouse, willing at all times to sell munitions for the sake of profit, to destroy human lives. And what happens when we do sell munitions of war? Those countries that receive the munitions immediately say they are buying them at exorbitant prices and that we are profiteering on their misfortunes, while the nations against whom these munitions are used because they do not control the seas, hold our Government morally responsible, claiming that we are doing our best to destroy their people, and, naturally, they have nothing but bitterness and hostility toward us, which may eventuate in dragging us into almost any foreign war. Therefore, if we continue the policy of exporting munitions of war we will be doing more to bring the United States into another war than anything we can do at the present time. [Applause.]

Oh, that mine enemy would write a book! I think that is the answer; I think he answers himself. The idea that this gives the President the right to declare war is a fallacy.

It is one of the straw men built up so that he may be knocked down. I think the Members of this House understand the situation.

It looks as though the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] would some time get into line, because he is a trained soldier. He has had men march before him and keep in step, but with the Democratic Party in this House it seems that nearly all the time he is the only man who is out of step, just like the soldier who believes that everybody else is out of line except himself.

Mr. CROSSER. Does the gentleman infer that these people could be actuated by partisan motives on such a tremendously important thing as this?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Oh, the gentleman will have to figure out the motives for himself.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. FISH. I just want to say to the gentleman that if we had an opportunity to offer amendments, I for one would certainly offer that very amendment, to apply to all nations, so that we could not sell arms or munitions of war, so that this would not be a potential slaughterhouse of the world.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I have no doubt that the gentleman may add that to his motion to recommit, and if such becomes the law, and then the President declares by proclamation that a state of war exists between Japan and China with all this talk as to China, all that will be left then to do will be to declare an embargo on arms as to Japan, as an embargo has been on arms to China since 1922, and you will accomplish that which you fear under this resolution. I insist the resolution be passed as it is. The administration is standing for it.

The policy which underlies the present resolution is the policy of "discouraging the employment of force in the course of dispute or conflict between nations." This is in line with the whole current of development since the war. It is not a new policy for the United States. For a quarter of a century the United States has been a party to the Hague Convention limiting the employment of force for the recovery of contract debt, and 5 years ago it was this Government of the United States which took the lead along securing the treaty for the renunciation of war as an instrument for national policy.

I have nothing more to say to you gentlemen. This is an advancement toward peace. Those opposed to it in the testimony before the committee were those who were interested in the profits of war, and never do I want to see the manufacture of arms in this country profit at the sacrifice of human lives. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] has expired.

All time has expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. GIFFORD, indefinitely, on account of illness.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIROVICH) laid before the House the following resignation:

APRIL 13, 1933.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. RAINEY: I hereby wish to submit my resignation as a member of the Committee on Civil Service.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT T. SECREST.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the majority leader what the program will be for Monday, aside from the vote on the pending resolution?

Mr. BYRNS. I am unable to say. It is suspension day. I do not know whether there are any matters on the Speaker's desk or not.

Mr. FISH. There was an agreement that there would be a vote on this resolution on Monday.

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, yes; but aside from the vote on this resolution, it all depends on whether any of the committees report on Monday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. There is no particular subject assigned?

Mr. BYRNS. No; and I apprehend there will be no reports from committees, and under those circumstances, there will be no business for the House except to vote upon this resolution.

EMBARGO OF ARMS

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, we have before the House now for discussion one of the most important questions that has been considered during this term of Congress. The purpose of the resolution is to prevent war and discourage it.

When we study the condition of our Government today and see what the wars of the past have cost the people of the United States in money it is simply appalling.

We are today paying out for the maintaining of Army and Navy and for the wars that have been fought in which we have participated, about 72 percent of the entire revenue coming into the United States Treasury. If this money, instead of having to be paid out that way, could be used for internal improvements in the United States it would only be a short time until this country would be blossoming like a rose, and everything would be prosperous, and everybody would have plenty of work, and we would again be happy.

Measuring this toll in dollars is not so appalling as it is when we measure it in human blood and sacrifice of our young manhood. More than 200,000 of our fine, young men fell in the last war in a foreign field and many of them are today buried in Flanders Field. Many a heart has been made sad in the United States by reason of that conflict, and it will take years to heal and will never be forgotten. Not only this, but we will be paying for that experience when the unborn become taxpayers of the country.

But this is not all; in these great conflicts of war we have our men maimed, gassed, and disease brought on them that makes them incapable of caring for themselves and they must remain a care on the Government and be sufferers the remainder of their lives.

The resolution now before this Congress simply proposes as follows:

That whenever the President finds that in any part of the world conditions exist such that the shipment of arms or munitions of war from countries which produce these commodities may promote or encourage the employment of force in the course of a dispute or conflict between nations, and after securing the cooperation of such governments as the President deems necessary, he makes proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export or sell for export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country or countries as he may designate, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

The manufacturers of munitions of war were the first witnesses before the committee considering this bill to try to defeat it. They must have an output and market for their products if they are to become profiteers as they have been in the past.

We had in the last war what was known as "the selective draft" that drafted our bright and best young men who were physically fit for service and carried them into war. Not on account of a choice they had made, and possibly against the desire of many of those who were compelled to make the great sacrifice that was made. Each was paid the pitiful sum of $1 per day for his services and served in the trenches of mud and dirt and bore his body bare to the bullets of the enemies. He got nothing, but made the great human sacrifice; and the men who made the implements of war and the material used in warfare were made immensely rich.

It is my contention and belief that this Congress should pass a bill authorizing the drafting of wealth as well as manpower in case it is necessary for defense of our country. Not only that, but they should also have the special authority and right to draft every munition factory and use it for the good of this Government.

Some have argued that this resolution is a departure from the customs of the past. Investigation of existing law and former precedents show that that is not correct. In 1905, when Mr. Teddy Roosevelt was President of the United States, he issued also a similar order, except that it was on his own action as President and not in concert with any other nations. I here quote you his proclamation:

Whereas by a joint resolution approved April 22, 1898, entitled "Joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States", the President is authorized, in his discretion, and with such limitations and exceptions as shall seem to him expedient, to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

Now therefore, I, Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, for good and sufficient reasons unto me appearing, and by virtue of the authority conferred upon me by the said joint resolution, do hereby declare and proclaim that the export of arms, ammunition, and munitions of war of every kind, from any port in the United States or in Puerto Rico to any port in the Dominican Republic, is prohibited, without limitation or exception, from and after the date of this, my proclamation, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

And I do hereby enjoin all good citizens of the United States and of Puerto Rico and all persons residing or being within the territory or jurisdiction thereof to be governed accordingly.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 14th day of October, A.D. 1905, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirtieth.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The resolution now before us does not go that far in extending power to the President, but simply says that after consulting the other nations orders of this kind may be made. Only two of the principal nations of the world today have not given this power to their executive branch of government. The United States is one of them.

When two nations are at war and one of them is favored by being furnished with the munitions of war, whether it is in the right or wrong it may be able to prevail. It should always be determined first who is the aggressor and who is in the right in bringing on these conflicts, and be sure the one in the wrong is not aided by other nations in shipping to it the munitions of war so that it may carry on a war of oppression or aggression when it is wrong in principle.

The President of the United States, with this privilege given to him, can be a wonderful force in keeping nations at peace rather than permitting them to go to war.

Much has been said in debating on this question about the intent of the resolution to affect the one nation of Japan. There is not an intimation in the resolution that would justify any such argument. Of course its provisions could be administered to any country and that nation as well as others.

The old Monroe Doctrine is a sacred and sound doctrine. We should have no entangling alliances with other nations. I am afraid within the last few years we have not adhered so strictly to that doctrine as was done in the beginning of our Government. We should be just and fair to every nation on the face of the earth and we have been so far, as history reveals. By doing this we should have the absolute friendship of the world.

This is needed not only as a promotion to peace but it also promotes business as well. This Nation should have its trade relations with every nation on the face of the earth. Nations, in dealing with each other, are just as individuals; there are certain motives in their transactions. If one nation likes another it prefers to deal with that nation rather than one that it dislikes. For instance, if you are living in a city where two men are engaged in business selling the same commodity at the same price and you are at liberty to trade with the one or the other, and you like one and dislike the other, which of the two will you trade with? The question readily answers itself, that you will trade with your friend. This, of course, is true with nations as well as individuals, and by having the friendship and respect of all the nations of the world we have our trade relations expanded and almost to the extent of our friendship.

It will always be necessary for the United States to be on the alert and prepared to take care of its own people and interests. We have more coast cities to guard in the case of an invasion by enemies than any other nation in my knowledge. This, of course, necessitates having a navy of sufficient size to protect our interests in case of an invasion.

I have always been a believer in a strong navy. I do not believe in a navy just big enough to get whipped in the first battle it goes into. The great trouble, as I see it, with our naval affairs, is not that we have too many battleships, but that they are too heavily manned in times of peace. If war should come we do not have time to prepare and build battleships, but if they are ready for use and service they can be very soon equipped with all the men that are necessary and that have had training in our Coast Guard and Annapolis school. The same might be truly said of the Army. One hundred and fifty-two thousand men on the pay roll in times of peace in the war service is unthinkable and yet we are enduring just that.

In the readjustment of the affairs of our Nation, much of this will be corrected. Since the Democratic Party took control of this House, and having only the lower House of Congress for the past 2 years, we have reduced the expenses of this Government around a billion and a half dollars, and it can be reduced a billion and a half more and never hurt the efficiency of our Government. The people have been burdened with taxes to carry these heavy expenses as long as they are going to be without severe protest.

If this expense could be eliminated we would then have sufficient money to care for the Nation's soldiers, as we have in the past. I am supporting this resolution and hope it may pass this House.

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Missouri, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

House Concurrent Resolution 13

Whereas there are in the State of Missouri vast areas in drainage and levee districts, covering nearly 3,000,000 acres of the most fertile land in the State, in which there is invested capital of nearly $50,000,000; and

Whereas a large part of this invested capital is represented in drainage and levee improvement bonds, many of which now outstanding are in default of payment of principal and interest because of the farm depression and low prices of farm products; and

Whereas these drainage and levee district farmers are being foreclosed and losing their homesteads and life savings because they are unable in this economic depression to meet the high taxation necessary to pay the cost of these drainage and levee improvements; and

Whereas the Glenn-Smith bill, the purpose of which was to provide a moratorium and long-time loan at a low rate of interest for the relief of distressed drainage and levee districts, was on the calendar of both the Senate and House in the last session of Congress, which adjourned before the bill was reached: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, memorialized to immediately enact a law that will be adequate for the relief of the now despairing farmers of the drainage and levee districts of this and other States, restoring the morale, the hope, and courage of the farmers residing therein, opening new reservoirs of credit that are now closed to them by reason of the high taxes, and preserve to the State and Nation vast taxable lands that are now, for lack of maintenance of the improvements, threatened with a return to their original state of swamps; be it further

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this resolution be immediately forwarded to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States at Washington, D.C.

Senator Jones moved that the Senate concur in the above resolution.

Which motion prevailed by the following votes:

Yeas: Senators Bales, Brogan, Buford, Crouse, Dail, Depelheuer, Doran, Gunn, Henry, Hixson, Joffee, Jones, Kennedy, Kinney, McDowell, Morgan, Nolte, Robertson, Rollins, Russell, Shotwell, and Titus—22.

Nays: Senators Briggs, Casey, Donnelly, Gordon, Haymes, Kelley, and Terry—7.

Absent: Senators Clark, Clayton, Daggs, Wisdom—4.

Absent with leave: Senator Bates—1.

Senator Casey moved that the above roll call be made a part of the record of said Concurrent Resolution No. 13.

Which motion prevailed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Leon Unit of the Clearwater County Farm Bureau, Minnesota, favoring the passage of legislation known as the "Frazier farm-relief bill", for the liquidation of agricultural indebtedness, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the Society for Cultural Relations with U.S.S.R. (Russia), of Chicago, Ill., favoring the prompt recognition of the Soviet Government of Russia, and also the negotiation of a treaty with Russia for the promotion of travel, trade, and cultural relations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication of Francis Williams, chairman, etc., of New Orleans, La., enclosing petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Louisiana relating to alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

6-HOUR DAY 5-DAY WEEK—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, on Friday of last week, I believe, yesterday a week ago, a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the so-called "30-hour week bill" was passed. Under the strange rules which we have in the Senate, we have not as yet been able to get up that motion. It is now evident that the pending bill will not be completed this week, and it is evident that it will take us several days to complete it next week. It is also obvious to many Senators that the quickest way to dispose of the farm relief bill is to dispose first of the motion to reconsider. There is an obvious desire on the part of some to prevent action on the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the 30-hour week bill was passed. There are many reasons why that is desired; I shall not now go into them; but as I have said—and I believe it to be true—the quickest way to get action on the farm relief bill is first to vote upon the motion to reconsider. It will take away the desire which exists in some parts of the country unduly to protract the consideration of the farm relief bill. It is obvious that so long as the farm relief bill is under consideration, and if we cannot take up the motion to reconsider the action of the Senate in passing the 30-hour week bill, it delays the 30-hour week bill just that long.

Mr. President, I am for the farm relief bill; I am for its expeditious passage; I want to pass it at the earliest possible moment. As I said before, I am convinced that the quickest way to pass the farm relief bill is to take away any possibility that the vote on the motion to reconsider the 30-hour week bill can be delayed by protracted debate on the farm relief measure.

Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent at this time that the pending farm relief bill may be temporarily laid aside, and that we may consider the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to reconsider the vote whereby the 30-hour week bill was passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, in the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], who has objected to any request for unanimous consent to consider the pending motion to reconsider, I am forced to object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not desire to have this put on the shoulders of the Senator from Oregon. The Senator from Oregon has not objected. The Senator from Oregon objected at certain times when there was an effort to limit the debate, but he specifically stated on the floor that it was because there was a proposed limitation of debate. Each time this question has come up, some Senator has said on the floor that he wanted to object not for himself, but always the statement has been made that the objection was in behalf of some other Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me to go a little farther than asking a question, I should like to make a suggestion.

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we passed the 6-hour 5-day week bill several days ago. There are two sides to it. I am not complaining of any Senator's vote on it. The very object of the motion to reconsider is to afford an opportunity to offer an amendment which was offered when the bill was under consideration. It was fully debated. We had a vote on it. There is nothing new in it. It is something the Senate has already threshed out.

It seems to me as a matter of good sportsmanship, no matter whether we are for or against it, we ought to end this delay that is coming about, when everyone knows there is not a new thing involved in the proposal. I do not want to delay consideration of the farm bill. I am opposed to going into consideration of the motion with unlimited debate. We can stop debate on the motion at any time if Senators are afraid. No matter what the intention is, the effect is simply to delay the sending of the bill to the House if we debate it without limit. We voted on it once. It was decided by the Senate, and the effect now is to hold it up really after the Senate disposed of it while we are taking up another bill.

I should like to say to those who are afraid we will delay the farm bill—and I am in entire sympathy with anyone who does not want to delay it—that if the motion is taken up, it will be in order to end the debate by a motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider. That would end it. We are not going into a long debate on it so far as I am concerned. If the Senator from Alabama does not make the motion after a reasonable time has elapsed—it seems to me in fact it has elapsed now—I will make the motion myself.

Mr. BLACK. I did not understand what motion the Senator said he would make.

Mr. NORRIS. I said I would make a motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider. It seems to me the Senator from Alabama would be justified in making it now. It is quite apparent there is nothing new that can be brought out in the debate. I understand the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is willing to have a vote on his motion, and I should like to have a vote on it, too. It is only fair to those who have been behind the legislation, particularly the Senator from Alabama, that the motion to reconsider be disposed of. I do not fear lengthy debate. If there is any indication of a lengthy debate, we can shut it off by a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I would suggest that so far as I am concerned it would be all right to lay aside the pending unfinished business for a period of 1 hour and then have a vote upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a good suggestion. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that he submit that in the form of a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will yield——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. As a matter of course, we are trying to expedite the passage of the farm bill. I made the proposal once before that we devote, if necessary, an hour to the motion to reconsider, and that at the end of the hour we should vote on the question of reconsideration. I do not want to cause any further delay, so I make the proposal that the farm bill be temporarily laid aside for 1 hour and at the end of that hour a vote be taken on the question of reconsideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. I have no objection to the motion being disposed of at the present time in that way, provided I am given 20 or 25 minutes time to discuss it. That is all I ask.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As the maker of the motion, of course, I should like to have 15 or 20 minutes, but I am willing to forego even that if it becomes necessary in order that we may dispose of the motion. I have no objection to the request.

Mr. SMITH. I will amend my unanimous-consent request by providing that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] shall be given 25 minutes of the time allotted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina submits a unanimous-consent request which the Chair will endeavor to state. The Senator from South Carolina requests that the pending business be temporarily laid aside to take up the question of reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate passed what is known as the 6-hour 5-day bill; that at the end of an hour a vote shall be taken on the question of reconsideration; that in the meantime the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] is to have 25 minutes of the 1 hour. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am sorry the distinguished Senator from South Carolina has seen fit to press the request. I had assumed that he was anxious to go forward with the unfinished business and complete it.

Mr. SMITH. I have so stated.

Mr. McNARY. A few days ago I objected to the consideration of other measures pending the disposition of the unfinished business. I have been told, we have all been told, by the able leader on the Democratic side that the Black bill is not a part of the emergency program of the administration. We know that the farm bill is. I am sure the motion to reconsider could not be disposed of in 1 hour. I do not believe in the allotment of time to any particular Senator under any circumstances. I want to protect the Senator from West Virginia and other Senators who are absent, but I could make no exception in this case.

Let me say to the Senator from Alabama that the orderly way to dispose of the matter is to take an adjournment this afternoon until Monday and have a morning hour on Monday, at which time the motion would come up automatically. Senators will then be advised that during that time the motion may come up.

Today there are 18 or 20 Senators absent, many of whom are interested in the Black proposal. I intend, whatever my own views are, to protect those absent Senators. I suggest that the Senator so arrange the proceedings of the Senate that we have an adjournment until Monday, at which time he can move in the ordinary way to consider his proposal. Entertaining that view and desiring to expedite and complete consideration of the unfinished business, and realizing there is nothing of tremendous momentary importance in the request of the Senator from South Carolina, I shall object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon objects.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the situation is to me a little mystifying. In the first place we have a motion to reconsider the vote on a bill which we know perfectly well will be passed again just as soon as the vote to reconsider is had. While I voted against the bill, nevertheless the bill was passed by a vote of 53 to 30 in the Senate. There is really nothing to be gained by the debate or by the reconsideration of the vote.

Secondly, we know, as well as we can know anything in regard to these matters, that this particular bill will never come back to the Senate in its present form. It will be modified and changed; hence we are now debating about a measure which will undoubtedly be wholly different when the other body has completed its consideration. The measure, when it goes to the House, will be radically changed from what it will be when we have voted on it a second time. It seems to me the motion to reconsider really has no basis in fact at all. Nothing is to be gained by it. There is no possible chance to gain anything by reconsidering.

I do not want to interfere with the desire of the Senator from Alabama to get the matter disposed of, but I am utterly opposed to further delay upon the farm bill. If matters continue on the farm bill as they have been, we will be here for a week or 10 days more in considering the farm bill. Spending another week upon the measure is something we ought not to consider for a moment. I would suggest to the Senator in charge of the farm bill that he endeavor to get a limitation upon debate on the farm bill now. We have debated the bill for about 8 days. Let us have a limitation of debate upon the farm bill and then we will begin to see our way through as to both these measures. As it is now, we are playing one against the other and making no progress with either.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, so far as members of the committee are concerned in the handling of the farm bill, I should be perfectly willing now to vote on the bill as is; but there are certain amendments which have been offered no doubt in good faith. I should like to have an understanding as to limitation of debate on the bill and on the amendments particularly that part of the bill which pertains to farm relief—that is, parts 1, 2, and 3. The portion of the bill that refers to the mortgage situation is pretty well understood by all, I believe. I shall prepare and offer a unanimous-consent request providing for limitation of debate. I shall present it as soon as I can confer with other Senators about it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to say 1 or 2 things with reference to what has been said on the floor this morning. I agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that there is no doubt about what the vote will be when we vote to reconsider. I do deny, however, that there is going to be any lengthy debate on the motion to reconsider. Those heretofore who have said there would be a lengthy debate have said they would not engage in it. It has always been true that someone else, someone whose name does not appear on the surface, is going to engage in lengthy debate. It will not delay the farm bill and would not delay the farm bill, and it is known it would not delay the farm bill to vote on the motion to reconsider. All we have to do is to hear the talk around the floor to know what has been going on and what is going on with reference to the farm bill. It will expedite the passage of the farm bill to take time out to act on the motion to reconsider.

There has been a serious desire on the part of many to delay action. The mistaken idea prevails among some that there should be built up a big backfire that will prevent favorable action on the bill in the House. I deny that any such thing can occur. But that is the idea behind a lot of the objections which have been raised from time to time. Until this morning the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] has not come out and objected to consideration of the motion. He stated 2 or 3 times that he objected to any limitation because he wanted time for debate. As a matter of fact, those who are behind the objection to the bill have not yet risen on the floor, except in about one instance.

We know what is going on. I would be the last one here to attempt to delay action on the farm bill; but I reassert that those who are genuinely interested in the passage of farm legislation can aid in bringing that about by first disposing of this motion. If we do that, I predict that some of the debate that is to take place on the farm relief bill will be made much shorter thereafter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before taking my seat I shall ask a unanimous-consent agreement to limit debate on the pending bill, the agreement to take effect after today. I think the proposal which I shall make will be a fair one.

Those who have long speeches to make—speeches that will require more time than would be allowed under the agreement to be proposed—can make them today. Of course, there is no way to force a conclusion of debate in the Senate except under a cloture plan. In my judgment, the debate so far as it has progressed, has been directed at the bill, and nothing has occurred that would justify the imposition of cloture.

An unusual thing has occurred in connection with the labor hours limitation bill. A motion to reconsider was made, and action on that motion has been indefinitely postponed.

Under the rules of the Senate there are only three ways in which, as I see it, the motion can be finally voted on:

First, by some agreement to lay aside the unfinished business and take up the motion. An arrangement of that character has been attempted many times by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. It has been consented to repeatedly by the Senator in charge of the pending bill. One Senator after another has objected, so that the motion to reconsider is delaying the normal progress of business in the Senate and in the House. An agreement for a reasonable limitation on the debate respecting the motion for reconsideration has been repeatedly declined.

Second, by displacing the unfinished business. No one desires that done.

There is a way in which a majority of the Senate can enforce its will on this subject. If the Senate adjourns today, the motion to reconsider can be reached during the morning hour on Monday, and a motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider can be made. If those who are anxious for an opportunity to discuss the motion to reconsider are unwilling to enter into any arrangement about it, if they are determined to hold up action on it, then I say that I shall seek recognition on Monday when the Senate meets after adjournment, and unless some other Senator makes the motion I shall myself make the motion to lay on the table, so that the Senate may finally have an expression on the subject.

I do not blame any Senator whose views justify him in delaying action here in taking the course that his conscience prompts. Neither can he object if other Senators do the same thing.

Those who wish to reconsider may obtain the opportunity to discuss the motion, if that is their primary purpose. If they are not willing to enter into any arrangement about it, if they are determined to block action on the motion indefinitely, then the only course to be pursued is to precipitate the issue and vote on it; and it may be precipitated and voted upon in the manner I have stated.

Now, Mr. President, I am wondering whether the Senate is in a frame of mind to enter into any arrangement for a limitation of debate on this bill after today.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I have discussed this matter with the Senator from Arkansas. There are some of us who want to discuss the matter of silver and inflation. I am hoping that we will get through with those matters today. The fact of the case is, we are going to do all we can to get rid of them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. LONG. But we might not. I think we shall be able to agree to a limitation of debate, and the fact of the case is, we are in favor of it; but we have deferred discussing it, largely due to the request of the Senator from Arkansas, until these perfecting amendments could get out of the way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am not asking that a limitation be applied to debate during the present calendar day. I am not going to ask that. My thought is that the Senators who wish to make long speeches, who feel that they should do it, will have that opportunity during the present calendar day.

Mr. LONG. The trouble is, I wish to say to the Senator, that someone may get in the way of these Senators. I know of only 3 or 4 who have made exhaustive preparations to speak, and I am not one of them. If no one steps in their way, they will get through today; but, of course, we cannot tell who else will want to speak.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Let us have the unanimous-consent proposition submitted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the expiration of the present calendar day debate on the pending measure be limited so that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on the bill, or on any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to the bill.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask to amend that unanimous-consent agreement so that it shall not apply to the present amendment on the matter of silver, or to the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS]. With that exception, I see no reason why the agreement cannot be entered into.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to say to the Senator that as far as I am concerned I have no objection at all. I am perfectly willing to have the debate limited. The Senator from Oklahoma, however, is not here at the present time. I think he wanted to take a longer time than the proposed limitation would permit; but I do not see any reason why the debate with reference to this amendment cannot be concluded today. As a matter of fact, I did not think it would take anywhere near that length of time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I wish to be entirely frank with the Senate. One of the objects in making this request is to relieve the tension here, so that if debate during the present day should be completed, the Senate might take a recess or adjourn until Monday. Until some arrangement is effected, those of us who are interested in the progress of the pending legislation do not feel justified in quitting their posts and leaving the matter entirely without effective arrangement.

Mr. LONG. Let me ask one more question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. So far as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] is concerned, I observe that he is not in the Chamber; but, Mr. President, he can have the opportunity to speak today without limit under the arrangement that I am proposing, just as other Senators may. The limitation is not designed to take effect until Monday. So I renew my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the unanimous-consent request is put, may I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas whether it would not be well to have some hour specified on Monday, if possible, when we shall vote without further debate, making the limitation as he has already suggested and then fixing some definite hour at which we might reach a vote?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I had not understood that it is possible to get an agreement for a final vote at this juncture. I hear about me now Senators saying that they would not consent to that arrangement. All I am attempting to do is to provide a fair opportunity for discussion, with a reasonable limitation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope no objection will be made to the Senator's request. Objection probably will be made if the Senator accedes to the request of the Senator from South Carolina.

All Senators know that whenever we fix a limitation for final vote on a bill, there are a thousand ways in which new things come in and have to be voted on without any debate whatever. It is never satisfactory when we get through. If the Senator's request is granted, it of itself will close this matter, and it will close it without ever compelling any Senator to vote on a proposition that has never been presented before, and that has not been debated.

I hope the Senator's request, just as he has made it, will be granted.

Mr. SMITH. The only reason why I made my suggestion is that without such an addition to the agreement it will be possible, if any Senators do wish to delay this matter, to continue debate under the 15-minute limitation on the bill and on amendments almost as indefinitely as if we had no agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas proposes a unanimous-consent request, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Arkansas proposes the unanimous-consent request that after the expiration of the present calendar day, debate on the pending measure be limited so that no Senator may speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes on the bill or any amendment that may be pending or that may be proposed thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. I object. I ask to amend that request so that it shall not apply to the pending amendment, nor to the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] for the inflation of the currency; and I ask that for this reason: The committee itself has said that that is more necessary than all of this bill put together, and I do not think we ought to restrict Senators on the matter of the currency and on the matter of inflation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? If it is more necessary than all of the bill put together, why did not the committee put it in?

Mr. LONG. I do not know. If I had been a member of the committee, I would have voted as the Senator suggests; but they evidently had good reasons.

Mr. BARKLEY. That casts some doubt upon the opinion of the committee that they think something that is not in the bill is more important than the bill itself.

Mr. LONG. I will read the Senator just what they said. I do not want to reflect on them.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to get into a long argument on the matter.

Mr. LONG. Here is what they said. I will read it if the Senator has any doubt about it. They certainly said so:

> The committee also directed that there be placed in this report a statement as to the necessity of an expansion of the currency and the absolute necessity for an increase in commodity prices. The statement as prepared and adopted by the committee is attached hereto, as follows:
> "DEFLATION MUST BE CHECKED
> "The policy of deflation of commodity prices and farm values inaugurated in 1920 still persists. The first groups to feel the effects of this policy were farmers and stockmen."

I am not going to read all of this; but they go on to say in this report that nothing in this bill is going to be able to save the farmer unless we inflate. I do not think it is going to take a great deal of time—not nearly so much as I heard taken over whether or not we were going to include the nicotine provision in the bill—to discuss this whole major and important scheme that is necessary to save the farmer. If the Senator will just exempt the pending amendments on the silver question and on inflation, the latter to be offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, I think we can get through within a short time. But it is hardly fair to those Senators who want to discuss those measures to be called on to wind up during a day when nearly everybody is going to be away from the Senate. Eighteen or twenty Senators are not in town, or not in the Senate, and probably that many more will not be here by the middle of the afternoon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. I object, unless I get my amendment adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I sincerely believe that this is an inappropriate time to make the request for a limitation on debate in the manner indicated by the Senator from Arkansas. There has been no disposition upon the part of any Member of the Senate to prolong debate unnecessarily. Our meetings have continued until half past 5 or 6 o'clock each evening during the time we have been considering this very important measure. There is no evidence of a filibuster; none would be tolerated or countenanced by any Member on this side of the aisle. This is Saturday afternoon, and many of the Senators are absent. I could not consent to an agreement unless I knew it met with the approval of Senators on this side of the Chamber.

A number of exceptions are made to the proposal. I think we should let the debate proceed in orderly fashion today. On Monday I shall be glad to confer with Senators on this side, and ascertain how many, if any, desire to speak longer than 15 minutes, or 30 minutes, or an hour. But there is no opportunity for a conference today. A request of this kind, I repeat, I think is not well timed when brought up on Saturday afternoon; but following the morning hour at 2 o'clock on Monday, when time will have been had to confer with various Members of the Senate who are absent, and those who are here, it would be appropriate to offer some sort of agreement for a limitation on debate.

Mr. President, I assure the Senator from Arkansas, however, that 15 minutes on the bill would not be sufficient, and I will explain to him one reason why we have not finished the consideration of the bill. The most important and likely the section in the bill which will be most profitable to the farmer has not yet been considered. A majority of the Republican Senators, at a meeting a week ago, decided to present a substitute for the whole of the bill. It cannot be presented in 15 minutes, it cannot be presented in 30 minutes.

I feel that if debate goes along today in the usual course, by Monday we can probably arrive at a more satisfactory conclusion. Entertaining that thought, and with assurances of my desire to cooperate to secure an early vote upon the bill, I shall at this time have to object.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, of course, it is futile to pursue the proposition further, in view of the statements which have just been made. I do wish to say, however, that 3 days ago, or more, I conferred with Senators, including the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Louisiana, about the advisability of attempting to secure a limitation on debate respecting the bill. It is my recollection that each of them at first consented, and the limitation which I then proposed was the same as that suggested now. Subsequently I was informed by one of the Senators that, owing to the absence of two other Senators who were greatly interested in the bill, he could not consent just at that moment.

Mr. President, I shall renew the request when the occasion seems more opportune to the Senator from Oregon and other Senators who have objected. Of course, it would do no good whatever, would accomplish little or nothing, to exempt the so-called "inflation amendments" from the limitation. I did not seek to arrange for a final vote on the bill for various reasons. The only course I see to pursue is to go forward in the normal way.

Mr. SMITH. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am in no wise responsible for the fact that we have not thus far obtained a vote upon my motion to reconsider the vote by which the so-called "30-hour week bill" was passed. On Friday a week ago I made the motion to reconsider. After Monday I joined with others asking for a unanimous-consent agreement limiting debate and specifying a particular hour for a vote on my motion. In no instance have I suggested that we take more than an hour and a quarter for the purpose of disposing of the motion. This morning I heartily joined with the Senator from Alabama when he asked for a unanimous-consent agreement to take 1 hour to dispose of the motion.

Mr. President, when I filed a motion for reconsideration of the vote on last Friday, which was the last day when I could file the motion, in view of the fact that the Senate was to be in recess and have an entire holiday on last Saturday, although now we are in a great rush, I supposed the motion would come up Monday, and that we would dispose of it in a reasonable length of time. It is regrettable to me that we have not been able to dispose of it up to the present time.

However, I do not know of any reason why there should be any great alarm over that question. Neither the President nor his Secretary of Labor has come out with any specific endorsement of the 30-hour week bill; but whatever endorsement they have given to it has been with a reservation that the bill needed amendment, and that they would suggest certain amendments to the bill. So there has been no haste on the part of the administration, or any request on the part of the administration that the bill should be disposed of at this particular time, or during this week.

Furthermore, a similar bill has been pending before a House committee; and if there ought to be extraordinary haste in this matter, why has not the House committee pursued the matter along such lines as the House deemed proper? There has been no particular delay, as far as the question of what will become of this measure is concerned. As far as the question of whether it will be disposed of today or Monday in the Senate is concerned, of course, there has been some delay, which I regret.

The notice having been given a few moments ago, however, on the part of the Senator from Arkansas that he would call up the motion on Monday, and that he himself would shut off debate by a motion to lay on the table, I am going to avail myself of the opportunity now, in view of his warning, to say what I want to say upon this occasion, and not be subjected to any such tactics as calling the motion up and then making a motion immediately to lay it on the table. I do not think I have done anything to justify any such treatment as that, so far as I am concerned; but having been warned, I propose to exercise my right and have a few words to say today as to why I made the motion.

Mr. President, I do not know that there will be any vote to reconsider. I have seen such things happen in this body in more instances than one. Ordinarily no one becomes offended when a Senator, under the right which he has under the rules of the Senate, has made a motion to have some matter reconsidered. There is no occasion to get all in a stew over it, and act as if there has been some terrible offense committed, probably treason. It just depends on who happens to make the motion, and in this case it happens that I made the motion.

I am sorry that we have not been able to dispose of the motion. I have agreed to a limitation on debate. I have agreed to fixing an hour for a vote, and have not only agreed to get through with my motion expeditiously but have endeavored to do so. I agreed today that there should be only 1 hour for the consideration of the motion, and did not reserve any right to speak myself. I will state that I never dreamed of causing any delay in the consideration of the motion here in the Senate. I thought the motion should be taken up and disposed of. I only wanted to speak on it for a few moments.

My object in making the motion was this, that if we could get a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill had passed the Senate, I would then propose an amendment providing that foreign goods, made by foreign labor, if they were sold in interstate commerce in the United States, should be subject to the same restrictions to which American goods were subject under the bill. In other words, to make it perfectly plain, my attitude is that a man who works in an American factory, a man who puts his capital into American industry, and manufactures a commodity, should not have imposed upon him restrictions which would give an advantage to the foreign laborer and to the foreign factory. In my opinion, if this bill shall become law as it is at present, that is unquestionably what would happen.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DICKINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand the Senator, the substance of the amendment he desires to present is what was contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD]?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The substance of it, the idea being that we should not say to the American laborer, "Goods from a factory where you have worked cannot be sold in interstate commerce except where there exists restricted labor, but, upon the other hand, every foreign nation on the face of the earth, if it desires, can bring into this country and sell in interstate commerce its products, although the laborers in that foreign country have the privilege of laboring for 10, 12, or 15 hours."

Mr. President, I think an amendment of the character I have proposed would be for the benefit and for the aid of the American laborer, and, under pretense or something else, it is contended that this bill is for the purpose of helping the American laborer. Yet in the bill as it now stands there are restrictions upon American industries which would give the foreign laborer a decided advantage over the American laborer, which would open up to him territory which he does not now have an opportunity to occupy, due to the fact that the American producer can place his goods into those markets at a price which will compete with the foreign products which may come in. But the bill would change the situation completely. It would fix up a nice little territory or field of trade for the foreigner which is now occupied by Americans—American laborers and American manufacturers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. No doubt, Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has in the consideration of this matter given attention to another factor, which he has, however, not adverted to, namely: Foreigners contend—and their contention, I think, is warranted by the facts—that, owing to our very large use of electricity in our industrial plants and the superior machinery and material generally that we employ, an American can produce very much more in an hour or in a day than is produced in foreign countries, by reason of their inferior machinery and their lack of electrical power. My recollection is that we employ about from 4 to 5 times more electrical energy in our industrial life and in our industrial plants than is employed in foreign countries. Obviously that increased use of electricity and our superior mechanical devices enable us to produce commodities very much cheaper in some respects than those which are produced in foreign countries. May not other countries retaliate and say, "We will not permit you to introduce your commodities into our country if they are produced by machinery that is superior to that which we use and if they are produced by electrical energy in advance of that which we employ"? The result will be, it seems to me, retaliation, and we will absolutely destroy our foreign trade and commerce.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, as I see it, almost every time an effort is made to provide a measure of protection for the American laborer and for American industry we hear threats of calamities that may befall us on account of the manner in which foreigners may consider it. I believe we in this country have had too much of an attitude of acknowledging and receiving as facts and actual conditions the suggestions made by foreigners. Regardless of the question of the advantage that we may have in some instances because of the use of machinery, it is folly, as I see it, it is absurd to contend that foreigners, with their longer hours of labor and with their facilities, cannot produce and place in this country a great majority of products cheaper than we can produce them and place them in our home market. This bill in its present form assists the carrying on of that kind of a program. It is so framed that our factories are bound to have to pay more. I do not object to that; I am thoroughly in sympathy with the idea of shortening the length of the day's labor here in America; but when we shorten the hours of labor, when we restrict and interfere with many manufacturing concerns in this country, I wish to have that action on the part of Congress redound to the benefit of American labor and American industry, instead of to foreign industry and foreign labor. Throughout my public career I have worked for the American laborer, and I am doing so now in trying to have the bill amended so as to protect American laborers against foreign labor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I voted with the Senator from Florida on both of these propositions, and I am going to vote with him again on them; but I am wondering if the Senator has considered the fact that the silver and currency-expansion program which we are trying to bring up here today is one of the reforms, along with what the Senator is advocating, necessary to protect what we have right now. If we do not get some recognition of silver, with the English pound falling from 4.88 to somewhere around 3.28, with the oriental countries doing business with England on a silver basis, and, in fact 60 percent of the countries of the world doing business on a silver basis, it is not difficult for them, in view of their own depreciated currencies, almost to preempt the American market.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think it is essential to do something to remedy that situation, and to me the tragedy of it is that nothing has been done previously, but, instead, it has been neglected up to the present time, though a remedy would, as I see it, help American labor and American industry.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I received this morning a letter from a manufacturer of lumber opposing this bill. I recall a very extended debate here in which it was contended that giving a tariff to the lumber industry would protect the American workman. There were most eloquent speeches made to the effect that it would keep up the standard of the wage of the American workman. This lumber manufacturer objects to this bill, and says he is now paying his employees 50 cents a day for a 11-hour day, and it will be impossible for him to maintain this 50-cent daily wage for 11 hours' work if the day is cut down to 6 hours. The Senator cannot see where the tariff on lumber is helping those workmen much, of course.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The tariff on lumber does not amount to very much. I would not pick out an isolated, extreme case like that and consider that it was representative of conditions that may prevail generally throughout the industries of the country. It is very regrettable if any lumber manufacturer only pays his laborers 50 cents for a 11-hour day. I do not know the particular situation to which he refers, but I know in Florida quite generally for a number of years after we were in the throes of the depression the sawmills strained a point to keep their people employed. They did this, although the lumberman had no market. These mills accumulated millions upon millions of feet of lumber in their yards with no market and no sale for it, but just so long as they could they tried to take care of their laborers far beyond the time when they were doing a business that was at all self-sustaining. A great many of them after they practically had to close down their mills or operate only 1 or 2 days a week gave the poor laborers who were working for them not a wage, for neither the manufacturer nor the men who received it considered it a wage, but they gave them something to keep body and soul together. The instance referred to by the Senator from Alabama may be one of those cases where the laborers were just given 50 cents a day in order to take care of them instead of having the Government take care of them. I am unalterably opposed to anything less than a good wage and reasonable hours of labor. I have always been one of those in public life who believed in making industry conform to reasonable requirements in the interest of labor and I have fought shoulder to shoulder with organized labor for better wages and shorter hours, as well as others, for labor's betterment. I am in sympathy with the policy of the bill and voted for it in this bill, to impose a restriction upon the hours of labor, but because I favor a principle of that character does not move me to the point where I would totally ignore and not consider other conditions which prevail in the industry while we were attempting to assist labor.

I do not see any reason why we should have half-baked legislation when we can have it more thorough and helpful for labor. If I may be pardoned for this comment, too much of the legislation we have passed through this body from time to time has been half-baked and has only considered one side of the case instead of going into the entire issue. On the night when the Senate was considering the first banking bill at this session I ventured to say on this floor—and I said it in a rather low tone, although I meant every word—that I was disappointed that legislation had not been brought forward that dealt more thoroughly with the situation, that only a part of the situation had been dealt with, and that we should enact legislation of a more general nature that would deal with the different features which constituted the American banking system. Of course it was regarded as almost silly by some of those who heard me for me to say that I was disappointed, but it just happened that within 3 or 4 days amendments were offered for the purpose of trying to strengthen the new banking law in some of the features I had criticized, and some of those amendments were of a very beneficent nature and very much needed.

From time to time we have measures coming before the Senate with all kinds of misnomers in their titles. I will say that during the last Republican administration it was heralded all over the country that we were going to have legislation in behalf of the home owner, and such a measure finally came forth in the form of what was known as "the home loan bank bill. I do not blame citizens who live five hundred or a thousand or two thousand miles from the Capitol for thinking that if they have mortgages on their homes and are in distress, with foreclosures facing them and their families probably in poverty and expecting to be ejected from their homes and being compelled to live on public charity—I do not blame such citizens for thinking, when such legislation was enacted, from what they had heard about it, from what had been heralded by the press throughout the country relative to the bill, that we had enacted a law which would take care of them; but up to the present moment I have not heard of any private citizen who has received a loan under that legislation.

The main object and purpose of that legislation was to take care of insurance companies, building and loan associations, and banks, and the last thing in the world that it was ever intended—and a person who will read the measure intelligently will know that to be so—was to help the common, every-day home owner, the poor person who has a mortgage which is about to be forcelosed. I sometimes think that we get merely a general idea about legislation and do not go into its provisions or its details with sufficient particularity. We are swept off our feet with the idea that the legislation embraces an admirable purpose, a commendable purpose, such as the idea embraced in the bill proposing to shorten the hours of labor and making two jobs where there is now but one. That is a very laudable sentiment, a sentiment with which almost any person would feel in accord; but when one comes to look into the provisions of the measure or its details and finds that the bill lessens the opportunity of the American laborer to place the product of his labor on the American market; when he ascertains that under its provisions it curtails the opportunity of the American factory to place its products in a large part of the territory of this country, then he realizes that, instead of carrying out the very commendable purpose of helping American labor and American industry, while it starts out with a good purpose, a noble motive, yet, under the provisions of the legislation, the benefit which was really intended for American labor has been given to the foreign laborer and to the foreign manufacturer.

I have no apology to make for the entering of the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed for the purpose particularly of having that question—and that is the one idea I had in mind—again considered by the Senate.

Of course, I do not like to take any time today. I have always been interested in the farmer. I was born on a farm; I spent considerable time in my boyhood upon a farm, probably until I was 15 or 18 years of age; and in my State during my public career I have devoted every endeavor within my ability to assist the farmer; I do not want to delay the pending measure one moment so far as the question of farm relief is concerned; but I did feel, with a motion staring me in the face to lay the motion made by me on the table, that I was thoroughly justified in occupying a few moments at this time in discussing the discrimination, as I see it, contained in the so-called "Black bill", which will work to the interest and benefit of the foreign laborer and to the detriment of the American laborer.

A good deal of discussion goes on in the Senate from time to time—and I have no criticism to make of it.

We often get in great haste here after we have finished our particular part of the program. I have seen it happen that Senators would speak for 2 or 3 hours, electrify the occupants of the galleries at least, even if they may have put some of their fellow Senators to sleep, and as soon as they got through with their speech they would suggest that we have a unanimous-consent agreement to end debate and vote on the pending question immediately. In other words, it seemed to be their idea that no one else could contribute any information or any enlightenment to the subject and that no other Senator had any right even to have his opinion recorded.

I have not talked 30 minutes altogether on the pending bill. I have heard a good deal of discussion in regard to it. I have heard Senators talk an hour or two and not say anything about the bill. I have heard others talk half an hour or an hour about the bill, and from what they said and the controversies which would arise among the experts we would be more confused when they finished than when they began.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is making comments on the methods followed in the debates in the Senate. The Senator knows in what bad repute, though undeserved, the Senate is over the country now. Does the Senator think he is raising our batting average any by his estimate of the deliberations of the Senate?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not think so, not since the controversy in which the Senator from Texas himself and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] indulged yesterday. I do not think that raised the batting average any. I am not sure, however, whether it was the Senator from Texas who engaged in the discussion about tobacco stems.

Mr. CONNALLY. I disclaim the implications of the soft impeachment which the Senator lays at my door. I have never discussed the question of tobacco with the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then I beg the Senator's pardon. However, he was engaged in a controversy with someone.

Mr. CONNALLY. I trust the Senator will withdraw that very serious charge.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will withdraw the charge so far as the Senator from Texas is concerned, and let it stand against the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of enabling me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Oh, no; I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, let us have a quorum!

Mr. TRAMMELL. Oh, no; I would lose the floor then, and I do not want to do that.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not intend that the Senator should lose the floor, but I thought we ought to have a quorum present to hear the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not intend to talk very long.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think it is well for the Senators to whom the Senator has referred to be here and get the benefit of his observations about their methods of speaking 2 or 3 hours and then leaving the Chamber. I am sure the Senator does not mean his characterization to apply to any of the diligent Senators who are now here giving attention to their duties. I think the Senator from Florida must have in mind those Senators who rush up to the oratorical breastworks and fire a salvo and then retire to the cloakroom or to their private rooms in the Capitol to take a little nap, or go out to the golf course.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That would apply to many of the Senators.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think those Senators, if they are going to get any benefit from the speech of the Senator from Florida, ought to be here. I think it ought to soak into their minds. It does not do any good for the Senator from Florida to lecture those of us who are here and diligently applying our energies to the public business. Of course, however, I defer to the Senator's wishes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not wish to occupy any unusual and distinguished position at all in regard to this matter. The Senator would apparently have it understood that other Senators would listen to me and pay attention to me, and he would thus apply to me a position which I do not occupy and which no other Senator occupies, so far as I know. While I have a great deal of respect and appreciation for them, I often think that Senators do not have that respect and appreciation which they should have for the utterances of other Senators or the position of other Senators.

But, Mr. President, I come back to the original subject. I had stated that we have a good many Senators who like to talk a good deal themselves and after they have finished they apparently think everything has been said that ought to be said and that it is then time to take a vote.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CONNALLY. If I do not irritate the Senator, I should like to interrupt him again.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator does not irritate me in the least, I assure him. I am glad to yield to him.

Mr. CONNALLY. What the Senator just said about Senators who take up a lot of time and then absent themselves only accentuates what he said a little while ago. I think, as to those Senators who lecture us for 2 or 3 hours, who make labored, uninteresting, dull, inane, colorless speeches and then rush out of the Chamber to play golf or retire to the lunchroom downstairs or for a nap in their offices, that good sportsmanship would suggest to them that they stay here and take their punishment, too. [Laughter.]

I do not mean by that remark to refer to the Senator from Florida. [Laughter.] I mean to refer to all of us. It is not fair to the rest of us who do stay here and listen to other Senators. They ought to remain here and listen to others when they speak. I am not referring to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The only comment I have to make on that suggestion is that the Senator ought to set a better example than he does.

Mr. CONNALLY. But I am here listening.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes; the Senator is here part of the time.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am listening to the Senator with a great deal of interest.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not care whether Senators are here or out playing golf.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was speaking of absent Senators whose place is really on the floor of the Senate when it is in session. I think they ought to remain here and listen to the debates. I quite agree with the Senator from Florida. It is Saturday afternoon and many Senators are out on the golf course or at the baseball park. It is all right to play golf, it is all right to watch a baseball game, but the first duty of a Senator is here on the floor where the public business is being transacted. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. TRAMMELL. I fully agree with the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (rapping with his gavel). The Chair must admonish occupants of the galleries that they are here as guests of the Senate and that under the rule of the Senate no demonstrations of any kind are permitted in the galleries.

Mr. CONNALLY. O Mr. President, that applause in the galleries is the first response I have received to any remark I have made today. [Laughter.] Why should the Chair interfere?

Let me observe to the occupants of the galleries that what I said about Senators remaining on the floor and attending to the public business also applies to the occupants of the galleries. It is the business of the occupants of the galleries to be seen and not to be heard. Occupants of the galleries are here by courtesy of the Senate and are not permitted to make any demonstration. Were I in the chair and the occupants of the galleries should violate the rule, I would order the galleries to be cleared. But the Presiding Officer, as is the habit of our Presiding Officers, lightly taps with his little gavel and observes that occupants of the galleries must be quiet, and that is all that happens. The only way to enforce the rule is to enforce the rule. If I were in the chair and the occupants of the galleries violated the rule, I would order the galleries cleared and I would start with the Senators' private gallery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair would suggest to the Senator from Texas that it is time for the Chair to have lunch, and he would be glad to have the Senator from Texas relieve him and take the Chair.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am making no personal reference to the present occupant of the chair. I mean the occupant of the chair impersonally. All Presiding Officers do it. The present occupant of the chair is simply following the precedents when he taps lightly with his gavel. I know if the Senator from Iowa had his way, he would probably bring in a maul, such as we use in splitting rails, and would hammer violently on the desk with it, instead of tapping lightly with a little gavel. He is simply following precedents in tapping lightly with his little gavel and admonishing the occupants of the galleries as to what their duty is in the circumstances. I have great respect for the present occupant of the chair, and I hope he will not go to lunch. I would dislike to see him leave the chair, because of his very graceful and dignified manner of presiding over the Senate.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have a little more sympathetic feeling toward the occupants of the galleries than is displayed on the part of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Florida has more favorites in the galleries than has the Senator from Texas.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have probably more in the galleries than I have on the floor of the Senate. I hope I have some somewhere. I should appreciate it very much if I did have. I have often seen the occupants of the galleries admonished in a very courteous way by the Presiding Officer when there was more noise and more disturbance on the floor of the Senate than there was in the galleries. I think the occupants of the galleries might be excused when such things happen occasionally. We have the rule, however. Of course, it is a good rule and we should not permit any general violation of it, but I do not think the galleries should be cleared by the Sergeant at Arms under any circumstances.

Mr. President, I did not intend to be diverted from the question I was discussing when I referred to what I thought was the fact about my friend from Texas debating the question of tobacco stems yesterday. I have apologized to him for that statement. Perhaps it was somebody else. Certainly some Senators were engaged in the debate. All I really rose to do was to utter my protest against legislation that I do not consider sufficiently broad in its terms or sufficiently flexible to give the proper amount of protection and aid to American labor and to American industry.

Instead of having the beneficent purposes for which the bill was originated and for which it is sponsored by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and others given over to foreign labor and to foreign industry, I think it should be so broadened as to protect completely our own labor and our own industries. Let any Senator go down on the streets of the cities in any State, and he will meet hundreds of American laborers out of employment. Talk to them about their idleness and the unemployment situation and ask what they think about a law which permits foreign products, made by foreign labor working 12, 14, or 16 hours a day, to come into the United States in competition with the goods manufactured in factories where they formerly worked. Ask how they like that kind of protection of American labor. We well know what the response will be.

From time to time I come in contact with people, many of whom are laborers, mechanics, people engaged in different kinds of labor, and I have not yet found any men who do not think that they ought to get the benefit of this legislation and not have the intended benefits switched to foreign labor and foreign factories. The way for them to obtain the benefits of the legislation is to write into the bill a provision that goods made by foreign laborers, produced by foreign manufacturers, shall be subject to the same provisions as the goods which are made in America and sold in interstate commerce.

Of course, some will talk about an embargo, some will talk about the tariff. The old bugaboo of the tariff on either side has been absolutely overcolored and overdone for years and years by both the advocates of a high tariff, the advocates of a low tariff, and the free-traders. So far as I am concerned, I think we have to have a reasonable tariff in this country; what we might call a happy-medium tariff. Such a tariff as was defined in the Democratic platform of 1928. In our last platform we really had no definite and plainly set forth definition of the tariff favored by our party. I think we need a tariff of the kind mentioned in our platform of 1928. Some, however, want an unduly high tariff and others want it entirely too low. Some apparently do not want any tariff at all.

If anyone wants to bring in as a matter of criticism the suggestion that my proposal is an embargo, I deny it. There is no semblance of an embargo in it when it merely provides that foreign-made goods, made by foreign labor, shall be subjected to the same conditions as American-made goods made by American labor. There is no resemblance between my proposal and an embargo, and any claim that there is is a dodging of the issue. If we are going to speculate as to the manipulations brought about by legislation, it is just as reasonable, or more reasonable, to say that legislation which takes into consideration only American goods and only American labor in the American market may be used so as to discriminate against our home markets and our home people and American labor, and no tariff question is involved in it one way or the other.

I think, however, that we should safeguard our people who have protection, or did have some protection, from the tariff. They have some, in some respects, yet. There are mistakes in the tariff law. I do not question that. Those mistakes have brought about some conditions which we would have preferred avoiding; but I think American labor and American producers have already suffered enough as a result of the depreciated currency and the cost of exchange, when today the average American who had any protection—some of them had about what they needed, some had too much, and some had too little; that would be my description of it—the average American today has had whatever benefit he might have had from tariff protection reduced two thirds.

So I take the position that if we are going to bring the tariff question or the embargo question into this discussion, American labor, generally speaking, and American products, generally speaking, have already suffered a reduction of about 66⅔ percent. They have already suffered to that extent. I hope and pray, as a friend of the laboring man, that we are not now going to pass legislation that will give the foreigner another opportunity to take from the American laboring man his home market, to take from him his opportunity—I do not mean totally, of course, but partially—to take away from him his chance to keep this home market and sell American-made goods to the American people in American markets. That right should exist without having legislation passed under the guise of being in the interest of American labor which in operation will prove beneficial and helpful to foreign labor and to foreign industries.

I have made the motion to reconsider in order that that particular provision of the bill may be reconsidered. I have spoken today because a threat was made, a positive statement, that if no one else should do it, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] would call up this motion on Monday and would make a motion to table it, and therefore cut off debate entirely. Fortunately for me—not for anyone else—it happened that the Senate remained in session after he had made that threat to use gag rule where it is absolutely unnecessary to make a motion to lay on the table. That has always been characterized, and properly so, as gag rule. The Senate having been in session after that threat was made, again within my rights I have availed myself of the opportunity to occupy a few moments in expressing my views on this question, regardless of how the motion to reconsider may go.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that he does not think a gag rule ought ever to be applied?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I did not say that. I said except in extreme cases.

Mr. LOGAN. I just wanted to be perfectly clear about that. Does not the Senator think we have an extreme case now?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not think so. When we are going to convene on Monday, after an adjournment, for the purpose of giving this matter consideration, and we are to have a 2-hour session in which it can be considered, I do not think there is an extreme condition which justifies anyone in getting up 5 or 10 minutes after the morning hour begins and calling up a particular motion and then moving that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. LOGAN. But this is a matter, is it not, that has been discussed and passed upon by the Senate? Now the Senator is taking the time to talk about a motion to reconsider when the people are waiting for us to do something.

The only disagreement I have with the Senator from Arkansas is that he should have made the motion to lay this motion to reconsider on the table when it was originally made.

Mr. TRAMMEL. Fortunately, under the rules he could not do that.

Mr. LOGAN. Just as soon as he could, then, I mean.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the Senator's view. Of course, if we are going to indulge in matters of that kind; while the Senator from Kentucky and I have been good friends, I have often seen the time when I should have liked to have some of his motions or measures laid on the table.

MURIEL CRICHTON

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate Resolution No. 60, to reimburse Muriel Crichton for certain expenses incurred because of injuries received in the Capitol Building; and since it will involve no debate, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S.Res. 60) submitted by Mr. COPELAND on the 10th instant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The amendments were, in line 4, after the word "sums", to strike out the comma and "not to exceed a reasonable amount", and in line 5, before the word "expenses", to insert "actual", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1933, to Muriel Crichton, such sums as may be necessary to defray her actual expenses incurred for hospitalization and medical care as a result of injuries suffered in the Senate wing of the Capitol Building.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION—PREVENTION OF PROFITEERING IN WAR

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, 2 years ago, by act of Congress, a so-called "War Policies Commission" was created, representing the House, the Senate, and the Cabinet, for the general purpose of taking the profit out of war. The Senate members were the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Robinson], the then Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Reed], and myself.

About 1 year ago a complete report and recommendation was submitted, together with certain legislation that was tendered for the purpose of accomplishing the objective, namely, to take the profit out of war so far as possible—a notable objective not only for peace but also for democracy.

The legislation died upon the calendar last year. I now ask, out of order, to resubmit the same legislation for appropriate reference; and I am introducing it in the name of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and myself. The legislation addresses itself to a purpose fostered for a decade by the American Legion.

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 42) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the fixing of prices in time of war and the prevention of profiteering was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY

Mr. HEBERT obtained the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEBERT. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator.

Out of order, I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution for proper reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be received and properly referred.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, is this joint resolution relative to the St. Lawrence Canal?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. To what committee did the Senator ask to have it referred?

Mr. PITTMAN. To the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this is not a foreign-relations matter. This is purely a domestic matter. It has to do with the division of costs between the State of New York and the National Government. In my opinion, it ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am sorry that I cannot agree with the Senator; but the question involves a treaty, because the joint resolution refers to the treaty. It deals entirely with the conditions and terms of the St. Lawrence Treaty. The committee that has studied the St. Lawrence Treaty will have the information upon which to report favorably or adversely on this joint resolution. In fact, this joint resolution is referred to in the committee's report on the treaty.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in spite of what my friend has said, I am of the opinion that the joint resolution should be considered by the Committee on Commerce. It is a question which has nothing whatever to do with the relations between the United States and Canada. It has to do with the relationship between the State of New York and the Federal Government in the distribution of costs. Therefore, while I do not want to be disagreeable, I must be insistent that in my opinion reference to the Foreign Relations Committee is the wrong reference.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations have for a long time been dealing with the treaty between the United States and Canada relative to the use of the water of the St. Lawrence River for two purposes—for navigation and, incidentally, for power.

The whole question in the negotiations between the two Governments turned on a phase of the matter involved in this joint resolution. In other words, the use of the water for power purposes subsequent to its use for navigation was allocated to Canada on the one hand and the United States on the other hand upon the condition that the Province of Ontario would receive from Canada the use of the water for power and would pay a certain proportion of the costs of the project; and that if the United States allocated it to the State of New York, they would pay a certain proportion of the costs of the project.

The water has already been allocated to Ontario under the treaty. The question is, How much of the costs should be allocated to the State of New York, what are to be the terms of the treaty of allocation to New York if it is allocated to New York, how much New York should pay if it is allocated to New York, and to what extent, if any, the use of this water for power purposes by the State of New York will interfere with the treaty? The whole matter is interconnected to such an extent that the committee that has had it all under consideration should determine this question, which is collateral to the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that this is a unanimous-consent matter; and that unless unanimous consent is given, the reference will have to be made by the proper motion.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this is a debatable motion that is made by the Senator, as I understand. If carried, it would displace the pending bill.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I cannot yield for anything that would have that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that if any Senator objects, the motion cannot be entertained at this time, because this is all a unanimous-consent matter.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I regret that I must object, and I want to say why—because this particular matter has nothing whatever to do with the treaty insofar as the relationship between Canada and the United States may be concerned. It has to do purely with a domestic matter—the question of how much New York State shall contribute to this particular undertaking.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield, though I do not want to lose the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator permit me to say to the Senator from New York that I completely agree with him that this is exclusively a matter of relationships between the State of New York and the Federal Government?

Will the Senator permit me also to say to him that I am perfectly sure he will facilitate the objective he has in mind if he permits the joint resolution to go immediately to the Foreign Relations Committee, for the following reasons:

The subcommittee of that committee which has been dealing with the entire St. Lawrence matter is in complete accord with the Power Authority of the State of New York. It has canvassed every phase of that relationship at great length. If the Senator will permit me to say so, it is wholly unnecessary, from the viewpoint of New York, to have the subject reopened de novo. I assure him that the way to procure the speediest possible consent to the precise viewpoint held by the power authority of his own State is to proceed in the manner suggested by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am much impressed by what the Senator from Michigan says. It may be, on further contemplation of the matter, that I shall agree with him; but in the meantime I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Objection is made.

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 43) providing for the use of the water of the St. Lawrence River for the generation of power by the State of New York under and in accordance with the provisions of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty between the United States and Canada was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States, submitting nominations (and also a message withdrawing a nomination), which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received and nomination withdrawn see the end of Senate proceedings.)

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I listened with more than ordinary interest to the discussion of the so-called "30-hour week bill" indulged in by the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I have been particularly interested in his observations as to the effect which that measure, if enacted into law, would have upon American workingmen and American manufacturers.

I am inclined to agree with many of his observations on that point. I should say more. I should be glad, of course, if the bill should pass and be enacted into law, to have it contain some provision to protect American labor and American manufacturers against importations from abroad, where labor may work almost limitless hours and be in serious competition with our people in the United States under the limited hours which are proposed. But at this time I desire to revert to the pending question, and to discuss some of the provisions of the farm relief measure now before the Senate.

We have had a Government of laws and not of men. This bill subverts that idea and makes of our Government one not of laws, but, to the extent of its application to our everyday lives, a Government dependents upon the whim, the caprice, the will, or the opinion not of a majority of our citizens, not even of anyone among us holding an elective office, and hence responsible to the people, but to that of a single individual—the Secretary of Agriculture.

I hesitate to think that the voters of this country ever had an idea that any such measure found lodgment in the mind of the President of the United States when he was a candidate for office. Nothing to which he voiced expression during the campaign of 1932 could lead one to such a conclusion. I propose, in the course of my remarks, to allude to the President's pronouncements on this subject during his campaign. I propose to show that in lieu of that definite, practical program which he promised the American people, he now offers a nebulous, chimerical, impractical scheme.

This bill creates a new Government bureau necessitating employment of thousands of agents under autocratic control, giving the Secretary of Agriculture power to make all rules and regulations having "force and effect of law" and exempting expenditures of money from review or audit by any other officer of the Government.

It provides for the erection of a political machine with limitless power to control elections by granting favors to either producers or processers and susceptible of flagrant corruption.

Section 8 of the bill defines the general powers of the Secretary of Agriculture. Paragraph 1 of section 8 gives to the Secretary of Agriculture the most sweeping dictatorial powers ever conferred upon any official in the United States, not even excepting the President. There is no limitation in this section to the powers which he may exercise in order to put into effect the general provisions of the law. Neither is there any definition of the manner in which he may exercise these unlimited powers. Moreover, paragraph (c) in section 10 provides that any regulations which the Secretary of Agriculture may make to carry out the policy set forth in paragraph 1 of section 8, or to carry out any of the other powers vested in him by this bill, shall have "the force and effect of law."

These powers are to be exercised not only in dealing with producers of the commodities named in the bill but also producers of any commodity which may be used as a substitute by the consumer in preference to the commodities named in the bill.

Moreover, these powers are to be exercised in dealing with all processors or cooperative farm organizations or any other agencies engaged in handling the commodities named in the bill, or with products of those commodities or substitutes for those commodities or substitutes for the products of those commodities, as, for example, rayon, which would be a substitute for cotton goods—the product of cotton.

The Secretary of Agriculture is empowered to use whatever means he desires to provide for the reduction in the acreage of cereals, cotton, and tobacco named in the bill, and for the reduction in production of dairy products and livestock named in the bill.

Several plans have been suggested to accomplish a reduction in the acreage planted in cereals included in this bill. These suggestions have appeared in similar bills introduced in previous Congresses, in public discussions, and in the public press and magazine articles. But every plan suggested depends upon a far-flung system of inspectors and agents to insure its being enforced. Paragraph (b) of section 10 recognizes this fact by authorizing the Secretary to establish State and local committees, or to delegate authority to cooperative farm organizations to do the policing necessary to bring about a reduction in the production of the commodities named in the bill.

The bill makes a further amazing provision that any money expended or any agreements entered into between any of these officers or agents of the Secretary of Agriculture and any producer shall not be reviewed by any officer of the Government other than the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Treasury. In other words, this bill puts the Secretary of Agriculture above and independent of the Budget Bureau and the General Accounting Office.

Some idea of the vast army of agents or inspectors necessary to enforce merely those provisions of the act which look toward the reduction of production may be obtained from the fact that there are in the United States 3,072 counties. Over 2,500 counties are listed as raising wheat. Over 2,800 counties are listed as raising corn, 1,070 counties are listed as raising cotton, and every county produces some class of livestock enumerated in this bill. To see to it that any agreements entered into by the producers of all these commodities in any one county were lived up to would require the whole-time services of several agents. The number has been variously estimated from 3 to 10 per county.

Then there is another army of inspectors that must police the processors, cooperatives, and other agencies handling the commodities or products thereof mentioned in the bill. The bill gives the Secretary of Agriculture absolute power over all such processors. They cannot operate unless they are licensed by him. Being licensed, they must comply with the regulations laid down by him, and there is no possible way to ascertain whether they are doing this or not except through adequate inspection. According to the Industrial Census of 1931, there are 2,452 flour-milling and corn-products plants; 54 rice cleaning and polishing plants; 306 macaroni, spaghetti, and vermicelli plants; 124 tobacco factories; 1,310 cotton-textile plants; 1,209 meat slaughtering and packing plants; 209 creameries; and 2,383 cheese factories. Not only must there be an army of inspectors to see that these various processors live up to the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, but the law provides processors shall install a system of accounts and keep records of the agricultural commodities or products thereof they buy and sell, the prices they obtain, and other trade practices. This calls for another army of accountants or auditors to see that these records are accurate.

The important point is the fact that the duties and powers of these two vast armies of inspectors are not defined by Congress but by the Secretary of Agriculture. This vast organization is answerable only to the Secretary of Agriculture. The House amended the bill so as to take all of these employees from under Civil Service and make them purely political appointments. The possibilities and potentialities of this vast organization as a political machine to play favoritism among both producers and processors in return for political support of the administration and political party of which these agents are the representatives is limitless, while the possibilities of graft are greater and easier than anything which disgraced the prohibition enforcement unit.

It does not require a far stretch of the imagination to picture a situation in a doubtful agricultural State where, by showing favors to the producers of commodities named in this bill, the vote of that State could be controlled. Neither does it require much vision to foresee what could happen in the way of campaign contributions from processors completely under the domination of an official of an administration who did not have to account for his actions to Congress and who was left with a free hand by Congress to make such rules and regulations as he saw fit in dealing with the processors.

Neither is it necessary to point out the hypocrisy of an administration which promises the elimination of bureaucracy, the reduction of the Federal pay roll, and the balancing of the Budget on the one hand, and then sponsors a bill setting up not merely a bureaucracy but an autocratic bureaucracy entailing an organization of tens of thousands of employees and its financial transactions with the millions of agricultural producers in the country exempt from any review by any officer of the Government other than the officer who directs this autocratic political machine.

WOULD MORE THAN DOUBLE LIVING COSTS OF CONSUMER

The plan would more than double retail costs of commodities and products of commodities named in the bill. Section 9, paragraph 1, of the bill stipulates the manner in which farm prices are to be advanced to the producer. They are to be advanced by giving the farmer the proceeds of a tax levied against the processors. That tax shall "equal the difference between the current average farm price for the commodity and the fair exchange value of the commodity."

The fair exchange value of the commodity, according to the bill—shall be the price therefor which will give the commodity the same purchasing power, with respect to articles farmers buy, as during the pre-war period, August 1909–July 1914.

Testifying before the House Committee on Agriculture regarding the domestic-allotment plan, December 14, 1932, Frederick P. Lee, attorney on behalf of the farm organizations supporting the measure—see Hearings on Agricultural Adjustment Program before the House Committee on Agriculture, Seventy-second Congress, second session, December 14, 1932, page 9—explained to the committee how this formula was worked out. His explanation was as follows:

First, you obtain the current index of prices paid by farmers for all commodities which they purchase; second, you obtain the 1910–14 5-year average of actual farm prices paid to producers of the commodity to which the formula is to be applied; third, you multiply that 5-year average actual farm price by the current index of prices paid by farmers. The answer is the price which should be paid to farmers at present in order to bring the price of their products up to a fair exchange value of the commodity. The bill further states that in making this computation the Secretary of Agriculture shall use statistics of the Department of Agriculture.

The March issue of a bulletin issued by the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics gives the index number of prices paid by farmers for commodities for the month of February 1933 as 104. The average of actual farm prices paid to producers for the 5-year period, 1910–14, is obtained from the United States Department of Agriculture's Yearbook. Multiplying that 5-year average of actual farm price of every commodity by the index number 104, we obtain what the farm prices of those commodities should be today, according to the domestic-allotment formula. The following table gives that computation:

Commodity	Index of price paid by farmers, February 1933	Actual farm prices, 1910–14 average	Prices to be paid as of today under allotment plan	Farm prices as of February 1933
Wheat	104	$0.881 per bushel	$0.916	$0.323
Cotton	104	$0.119 per pound	.124	055
Corn	104	$0.632 per bushel	.657	.194
Rice [1]	104	$0.838 per bushel	.871	.392
Tobacco [1]	104	$0.104 per pound	.108	.107
Hogs	104	$7.24 per hundredweight.	7.53	2.94
Cattle (prime beef)	104	$7.57 per hundredweight.	7.87	3.31
Sheep and lambs [2]	104	$4.91 per hundredweight.	5.11	[3] 2.16 / [4] 4.19
Butter	104	$0.30 per pound	.312	.181
Cheese [1]	104	$9.156	.162	.10

[1] The farm prices in the last column of the above table for rice, tobacco, and cheese are not as of February 1933, but are the last available data obtainable at the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

[2] The Agricultural Yearbook gives the 5-year average farm prices of sheep and lambs combined, as indicated in the above table. However, current quotations separate sheep and lambs, as indicated in the last column.

[3] Sheep.

[4] Lambs.

In the above table the farm prices as of February 1933 are taken from a bulletin issued by the U.S. Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Mar. 1, 1933.

This table shows that were the domestic-allotment plan to become effective as of today, the farm prices of the commodities indicated would be increased, as follows: Wheat 183.6 percent, cotton 125.5 percent, corn 238.6 percent, rice 122.2 percent, tobacco 0.9 percent, hogs 156.1 percent, cattle 137.7 percent, sheep and lambs 59 percent, butter 69 percent, and cheese 62 percent.

Without taking into account any legitimate and necessary pyramiding which must take place in the handling of a commodity between the time it leaves the farm and the time it reaches the consumer, the prices of products made from commodities which I have enumerated would be more than doubled to the consumer. However, inasmuch as each middleman handling the commodity or the product thereof must take his profit on the basis of the cost of the commodity to him, prices of products made from those commodities would be doubled over present prices by the time they reached the consumer.

Furthermore, under the bill the consumers will have no recourse from this legislative hold-up. Section 15 of the bill is devoted to provisions whereby the consumer cannot escape from increased prices of processed commodities, due to the law. That section of the bill provides that whenever, by reason of high prices of products of any of the named commodities, the consumer attempts to escape by purchasing substitutes, such as oleomargarine in place of butter, or rayon and silk in place of cotton goods, and so forth, the Secretary of Agriculture shall stop any such attempt by levying a processing tax on the substitutes.

All of section 15, as well as paragraph B of section 9, makes the admission that, as a result of this plan, there will be a decrease in the consumption of the commodities brought under the plan, and the purpose of section 15 is to block, if possible, any such decrease in consumption by resorting to substitutes.

THE BILL VIOLATES ALL PRINCIPLES OF EQUITABLE TAXATION AND REPUDIATES ALL DEMOCRATIC PLATFORMS

Mr. President, it is axiomatic that the smaller the wage or income of a family, the greater the proportion of that income which must be spent for food and clothing.

In other words, every family must first provide for food, clothing, and shelter—the three prime necessities of life. These items must be taken out of every family budget before anything else is purchased. Consequently, the smaller the family income the larger the percentage of that income which must go for food, clothing, and rent. Those who are "merely existing" take practically all their income for these three items.

A survey made by the United States Labor Bureau about 3 years ago of the manner in which the average industrial worker of the United States spends his dollar showed the following division of the average working man's budget:

	Percent
Food	32.3
Rent	22.6
Clothing	12.2
Fuel and lights	6
Household furniture and fixtures	5.2
Doctors and medicine	3.8
Insurance	3.4
Car and bus fare	2.2
School expenditures	0.4
Miscellaneous	11.9

From this analysis it is seen that food and clothing, under normally prosperous conditions with the wages and the standard of living which prevailed at that time, took 44.6 percent of the income of the industrial workers of the United States.

As wages decrease, the items contained in the classification of "miscellaneous", which includes recreation, travel, and so forth, and the other items, with the possible exception of doctors and medicines, must necessarily decrease, and it takes a larger and larger percentage of the family income to provide food and raiment.

Under the present industrial conditions it is safe to assume that practically all the income of industrial workers is consumed in an effort to provide food, clothing, and shelter. This is evidenced by the decrease in the purchase of other commodities not classified as necessities, such as automobiles, radios, household furniture, and so forth.

It is a fundamental principle of taxation that taxes should be levied according to the ability of the individual to pay. That is the principle followed in the formulation of the income tax.

The opposition to the general sales tax was based upon the argument that it taxed the poor man out of all proportion to his ability to pay. To rectify this inequality the sales tax as presented to the House proposed to exempt from its provisions all articles of food and clothing.

The domestic-allotment plan is a sales tax confined exclusively to food and clothing. It, therefore, is a violation of the fundamental principles of just and equitable taxation, in that under present conditions it would levy upon practically all of the income of industrial wage earners and other wage earners who are working on greatly reduced salaries. Under the provisions of the bill as introduced the prices paid the farmer for cattle, sheep, hogs, wheat, cotton, corn, butter, and cheese would be from 150 percent to 300 percent greater than the prices now paid, without allowing any pyramiding, which is inevitable in the processing and merchandising of any agricultural commodity. These figures mean that the cost of food and clothing made from the agricultural commodities named would be increased by that much to the consumer.

Furthermore, the bill allows the consumer no escape from this increase in living costs by the substitution of other articles. For example, if he seeks to avoid an increase in the price of butter by buying oleomargarine, the bill provides the Secretary of Agriculture shall stop such substitution by levying a processing tax on oleomargarine. Section 15 of this bill is designed to prevent the consumer's resorting to substitutes in order to escape high living costs.

Or take clothing made from cotton. If, by reason of this bill becoming a law, cotton goods would double or treble in price and the ultimate consumer endeavored to escape this increase by switching to rayon or other textiles, the bill provides the Secretary of Agriculture shall immediately levy a tax on such substitutes.

This proposal is not only a violation of the fundamental principles of equitable taxation, but it is a repudiation of practically every Democratic platform that has been written since the Civil War. All such platforms have demanded that all general taxes should be levied upon wealth. The Democratic platform of 1924 states that any system of Federal taxation should not "take from the poor any part of the necessities of life", and that all Federal taxes should be—so adjusted as to lay the burden of government upon the taxpayers in proportion to the benefits they enjoy and their ability to pay. We oppose the so-called "nuisance taxes", "sales taxes", and all other forms of taxation that unfairly shift to the consumer the burdens of taxation.

The same thought has found place in practically every Democratic platform.

For instance, in 1888 the platform said:

All unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation. It is repugnant to the creed of Democracy that by such taxation the cost of the necessities of life should be unjustifiably increased to all our people.

The Democratic platform of 1884 was almost prophetic in its denunciation of this very bill, for it said:

We are opposed to all propositions which upon any pretext would convert the General Government into a machine for collecting taxes, to be distributed among the States or the citizens thereof.

And the Democratic platform of 1880 was scarcely less prophetic in its denunciation of the present Democratic proposal, for it said:

The Democrats of the United States in convention assembled declare opposition to centralization and to that dangerous spirit of encroachment which tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments into one, and thus to create, whatever be the form of government, a real despotism.

DOMESTIC-ALLOTMENT PLAN WOULD ABSOLUTELY DESTROY FOREIGN MARKETS FOR ANY OF THE PROCESSED COMMODITIES INCLUDED IN THE PLAN

It is not necessary in an analysis of the bill to reason why there has been a decrease in the foreign markets of America's agricultural products. But if such analysis were made it could be summed up as follows: Agricultural products from other agricultural countries, such as the Argentine, South Africa, Russia, Australia, and New Zealand, are entering the world markets at a price so low that the American farmer cannot meet that price, and therefore is driven from foreign markets by the operation of the law of competition.

European countries which are large importers of food supplies are exerting every effort to increase their domestic supply of foodstuffs. One of the methods generally adopted is the application of antidumping regulations against food imports and other manufactured goods. Section 17 of the bill not only provides for but encourages and puts a premium upon the exportation of the processed commodities named in the bill and their sale in foreign markets at a lower price than they are sold in this country. It does this by providing for a rebate or refund of the processing tax to the exporter of such products.

The moment the bill became a law, European countries having antidumping provisions would instantly put up the bars against the importation of such products.

A BILL TO PUT MANUFACTURERS OUT OF BUSINESS

The domestic allotment bill might well be entitled "A plan to put processors of agricultural commodities out of business." Paragraph 2 of section 8 of the bill admits that the taxes levied against the processors of the commodities named in the bill will be so heavy that the processors affected may not be able to pay those taxes out of their own corporate income. The bill provides that such processors may borrow enough money to pay the processing tax from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at a rate of interest of 3 percent per annum. Incidentally, that adds that much more to the ultimate cost of living to the consumer.

It would seem that when comparatively few industries of any kind are operating at a profit, even after they have cut wages and all overhead to the bone, and when hundreds of our industries have been unable to weather the storm, this would be a most inopportune time to add to the staggering burdens industry is carrying by adding a tax which is variously estimated at from $1,500,000,000 to $2,000,000,000.

It would seem when the railroads of this country are facing the most critical period of their existence, when they are exerting every effort to increase their car loadings and freight revenue, it is a most inopportune time to pass a law that will reduce by 20 percent to 25 percent car loadings of the agricultural commodities named in this act.

The bill not only is oppressive to the degree of extortion upon the processors who handle commodities after the bill has become effective, but it is retroactive in its provisions. Section 16 of the bill provides the processing tax must be levied against handlers of the agricultural commodities named on all products they have on hand at the time the bill becomes effective. Some idea of what this means may be obtained from a story in the Chicago papers that, if the bill were to become effective at present, the floor tax or stock tax provided for in section 16 would cost the packing industry of this country $200,000,000.

It would be difficult to imagine a more disastrous blow to our already crippled industrial activities or a more effective measure to prevent a restoration of prosperous industries and the increase of employment in those industries.

SOVIETIZATION OF AGRICULTURE

The bill provides no definite plan for bringing about a reduction in the acreage of cereals, cotton, and tobacco named in the bill, or in the reduction of livestock and dairy products. Those details are left entirely to the Secretary of Agriculture in paragraph 1 of section 8. Several plans have been suggested whereby reduction of acreage may be obtained through agreements with those farmers who already are engaged in growing the commodities named. Assuming, for argument's sake, that all such agricultural producers would enter into an agreement to reduce acreage and would live up to that agreement, the question arises, what of those farmers who have not been engaged in raising the cereals named in the bill, or in raising cotton or tobacco? How are they to be prevented from engaging in the growing of such products?

The agricultural census shows every State in the Union grows wheat and corn. It further shows that in many States the acreage planted in wheat and corn has constantly increased over a period of years. For example, Ohio's acreage of wheat harvested steadily increased from 872,000 acres in 1928 to 1,723,000 acres in 1931. Indiana's acreage of wheat harvested increased from 910,000 acres in 1928 to 1,678,000 acres in 1931. Kansas, the largest wheat-growing State in the Union, which produces over 25 percent of the total wheat harvested in the United States, had an average acreage of less than 10,000,000 acres in the period 1924 to 1928, but in 1928 it harvested 10,473,000 acres of wheat, and this acreage steadily increased to 1931 when the acreage harvested was the record-breaking total of 12,632,000. Texas has more than doubled its wheat acreage in the last 5 years and is still developing. What is to prevent a continuation of this development of wheat acreage all over the country by farmers who hitherto have raised no wheat, going into the wheat-raising industry in order to avail themselves of the bonuses provided in this bill? Suppose, for example, that when the plan is finally worked out it is provided that all wheat growers must reduce their acreage 25 percent from the acreage they have had in wheat for the last 3 years, or 5 years, or even from the acreage they had last year.

If they do this in all good faith, they become beneficiaries under the law of whatever bonuses are paid to wheat growers complying with the law. A farmer who has grown no wheat could put 100 acres in wheat this year, and there would be no way in the world to stop him except by the arbitrary power and ruling of the Secretary of Agriculture. He could, under the provisions of this bill, make a rule or regulation prohibiting any farmer who has hitherto not raised wheat from engaging in production of wheat, and, under the provisions of this bill, such rule or regulation would have "the force and effect of law" and any violation of such a rule or regulation would subject such a farmer to a fine not in excess of $100. This same argument exactly could be applied to the farmer who wanted to engage in raising corn or cotton or tobacco, or who, not having engaged in any livestock industry, decided to begin raising hogs or cattle or sheep.

This is Russian sovietization pure and simple. It is not only the theory of the Soviet Government, but it is the practice of the Soviet Government in dealing with its agricultural producers. If our Government, through an arbitrary rule of the Secretary of Agriculture, can forbid any farmer's raising wheat or corn or hogs or cotton or tobacco under penalty then it can also compel him to raise wheat or corn or any other commodity, even though he does not care to do so, and it can compel him to deliver all or part of that production to the Government or to any processor for a fixed price. The power to forbid any farmer's engaging in production is also the power that can compel him to engage in production. The power of the Government to increase the price of any agricultural commodity by an arbitrary ruling of an officer of the Government having the full force and effect of law, carries with it also the power to decrease the price of any agricultural commodity.

FUTILITY OF ATTEMPTING TO CONTROL PRODUCTION BY REDUCING ACREAGE

Assuming that the plan set up by the Secretary of Agriculture for the reduction of acreage of cereals, cotton, and tobacco should be both practicable and foolproof and that it would be honestly administered upon the part of the Government officials and honestly observed upon the part of the producer, there yet remains the uncontrollable factor of the elements of weather and pests, which render it absolutely impossible for the most perfect human plan to determine how much of a crop may be harvested from a given number of acres planted.

Mr. President, I have prepared a table showing acreages in the different agricultural commodities over a period of years, which I shall not take the time to read, but which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

CORN

1928, acreage 100,673,000; yield, 2,818,901,000 bushels.
1930, acreage 100,829,000; yield, 2,081,048,000 bushels.

WHEAT

1928, acreage 58,272,000; yield, 914,876,000 bushels.
1929, acreage 62,671,000; yield, 812,573,000 bushels.
1931, acreage 54,949,000; yield, 892,271,000 bushels.
1924, acreage 52,535,000; yield, 864,482,000 bushels.
1925, acreage 52,367,000; yield, 676,765,000 bushels.

TOBACCO

1917, acreage 1,517,800; yield, 1,249,276,000 pounds.
1924, acreage 1,537,843; yield, 1,106,340,000 pounds.
1923, acreage 1,877,000; yield, 1,515,110,000 pounds.
1930, acreage 2,110,330; yield, 1,510,308,000 pounds.

COTTON

1927, acreage 40,138,000; yield, 12,955,000 bales.
1931, acreage 40,495,000; yield, 16,918,000 bales.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, from these figures it is readily seen that there is no definite relation between acreage and yield, and any plan for the reduction of the quantity of any harvested crop which depends upon its acreage for its success, is certain to fail.

IS THE PROBLEM ONE OF DECREASING PRODUCTION OR OF INCREASING CONSUMPTION?

A statement issued by the department of rural economics of Ohio State University shows that production of agricultural products has been steadily declining, until today it is at a lower ebb than it has been for many years. It does not need statistical tabulation to establish the fact that consumption of food products, as well as of other commodities, is at the lowest point today of two generations, due to the industrial depression. Conservative figures place the number of unemployed wage earners at 10,000,000. Counting two individuals dependent upon each wage earner, we would have 30,000,000 people today without any income. The other 90,080,000 of our population are on a greatly reduced income, no matter whether they are wage earners or capitalists, employers or employees.

Moreover, it is a matter of historical record as well as of statistical record that every industrial depression in the United States which has resulted in any appreciable number of unemployed has been inevitably followed by a decrease in the consumption of farm products and a corresponding decrease in the price of farm products. Furthermore, the economic history of the country shows that when the industrial wage earners were put back to work, almost immediately there resulted an increase in the consumption of farm products and an increase in the prices thereof.

Apparently, then, the way to attack the farm depression is not by still further decreasing an already low level of farm production but to increase employment in industrial centers. We cannot starve an individual or a nation into prosperity and higher price levels by attempting, through curtailment of his food supplies, to compel him to pay higher prices for what little food he does buy.

THE PROMISE AND THE PERFORMANCE

As a candidate for the Presidency, Governor Roosevelt repeatedly informed the country that he had a very definite agricultural relief program which he would submit to the Congress if he were elected, and if he were given a Democratic Congress would guarantee its speedy enactment into law.

At San Francisco, September 23, in his address at the Civic Auditorium, Governor Roosevelt said:

> The farm problem is probably the most serious that faces our Government today, and you people in the cities know how dependent you are for your prosperity on the purchasing power of the farmer of your Nation. Until the purchasing power of the farm is restored industry itself will never revive. * * * And I propose as a temporary measure, until we reestablish world trade through a sensible method of tariff by negotiation, to provide for the farmer what he calls a tariff benefit.
> That, my friends, in simple terms means that the farmer is to receive a price for his product, that portion of his product that is consumed in the United States, a price equal to the world price on these commodities plus the amount of the tariff.
> Now, my friends, that is something definite. It is something that intelligent farm leaders have been asking for and advocating year after year. It is not visionary. It is practical.

Referring to his Topeka speech of September 14, Governor Roosevelt at Sioux City, Iowa, September 29 said:

> The meeting of the farm problem is going to be successful only if two factors are present. The first is a sympathetic administration in Washington, and the second is the hearty support and cooperation of agriculture itself and its leaders.
> The proposals I made in Topeka were set forth in this spirit. * * * I have set up these proposals as a definite standard to which men and women of all parties could repair, to the end that the desperate plight of agriculture may be remedied.

At Wheeling, W.Va., October 19, he said:

> I have suggested a program for the rehabilitation of agriculture. * * * This program is practical and I pledge to you that it will be carried out with speed and dispatch.

At Springfield, Ill., October 21, Governor Roosevelt said:

> I want to call your attention to one of the aspects of the great American agricultural problem. More than a month ago at Topeka, Kans., I set forth a comprehensive national program for agriculture. * * * This program is conceived to meet a condition which cannot longer be endured in a nation endowed with so much natural wealth. I indulge in no magic formula. * * * May I also add that I would be the last person to claim sole credit for the program which I enunciated at Topeka. * * * It is a program worked out in cooperation with the wisest leaders of agriculture itself.

At Atlanta, Ga., October 24, he said:

> I wish to outline tonight the cardinal points in my agricultural program. * * * Another principle of farm relief is to make it possible for the farmer to get a larger return for his product. * * * The basic purpose of my farm program is to raise prices on certain agricultural products by some form of what the farmers of this country know as a tariff benefit. There is nothing mysterious about this and nothing visionary. It is recognized by the leaders, not only of agriculture but of the industrial world as well, that this is a perfectly sound method.

Later on in the same speech, he said:

> During these weeks I have made it abundantly clear that I propose a national agricultural policy which will direct itself not only to the better use of our hundreds of millions of acres of every type of land in the United States, but also to the rehabilitation of that half of our population which is living on, or directly concerned with, the products of the soil.

In closing his campain, in a speech at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, November 4, Governor Roosevelt reviewed what he had promised the people in the way of a definite program of reconstruction which would lift them out of the depression. The following is an excerpt from that speech:

> I have sought during these months to emphasize a broad policy of construction, of national planning, and of national building, in harmony with the best traditions of the American system. * * * At Topeka I outlined a complete national plan for the restoration of agriculture.

So much for the promises which he made.

What is his definite plan, which he repeatedly stated during the campaign had been worked out, that it was practical, that it was not visionary, that it had received the endorsement not only of agricultural leaders but of industrial leaders, that it was workable? He submitted this plan to Congress in a special message Thursday, March 16. The best he could say for it was as follows:

> Deep study and the joint counsel of many points of view have produced a measure which offers great promise of good results. I tell you frankly it is a new and untrod path, but I tell you with equal frankness that an unprecedented condition calls for the trial of new means to rescue agriculture. If a fair administrative trial of it is made and it does not produce the hoped-for results, I shall be the first to acknowledge it and to advise you.

Quite a difference between the President's official presentation of the measure to the Congress and the definite, unequivocal promises he made during the campaign!

His message indicates he does not know whether or not it is workable—although in the campaign he said he had a plan which was workable.

In his message he clearly states he does not know whether it is practical—although in the campaign he said the plan he had worked out was practical.

In his message he clearly indicates that he does not know whether or not it is visionary—although in the campaign he assured the people it was not visionary.

In his message he clearly indicates there is nothing definite in his mind as to whether or not it will bring about the desired results—although in his campaign he repeatedly told the people his plan was definite.

I am not unmindful of the results which will flow from the operation of this bill, as I interpret its provisions. I am convinced that, so far as cotton textiles are concerned, the bill is most discriminatory.

The bill admits, as I see it, that the operations of the law would undoubtedly raise the price of cotton goods to such an extent that buyers would seek substitutes, such as rayon, linen, and so forth. Then it attempts to set up preventives or safeguards against such substitutions by authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to impose a processing tax.

There is nothing in the bill, however, and there can be no provision that would prevent the American buyer from substituting foreign cotton goods for domestic cotton goods; and with cotton goods increased in price by reason of this bill, as they would be—for the bill would double the price of raw cotton—foreign manufacturers of cotton textiles would be able to jump our tariff walls and undersell our cotton manufacturers in this market. Even at the present price of raw cotton and the corresponding present price of cotton textiles there are many cotton textiles being imported and sold at a profit to the importer. Increase our domestic prices and the imported cotton goods would drive the domestic cotton goods out of the market.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HEBERT. I do.

Mr. HATFIELD. Has the Senator given any consideration to the farmers who own farms in a State that has within it cities of large population, and what advantage the millers or processors in those States would have over the millers or processors in States where the population is small?

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, undoubtedly an advantage may come under those conditions in a State like my own, for instance, where most of the farmers do not have to travel more than 20 or 30 miles to an ideal market. That is not true all over the country.

Mr. HATFIELD. For instance, take the State of New York. Would not the farmer in the State of New York fare far better than a farmer out in the Central West or out in the Northwest who produced like commodities, in that the New York farmer could sell his products within the State of New York and not come under the processing law at all?

Mr. HEBERT. Of course, Mr. President, so far as the commodities produced and consumed in a given State are concerned, as I understand the operation of this measure, they would not be subject to its provisions; and, therefore, to that extent, the local producer would have a marked advantage over a producer in another State transporting his goods there for sale.

Mr. HATFIELD. Then the far-away farmer in the West or the Northwest would have a very great disadvantage in selling his products in the thickly populated sections—in the eastern sections, say—that he could not very well overcome, as compared with the local conditions that exist respecting the preference given to the local farmer.

Mr. HEBERT. Unquestionably there would be that differential.

It should not be difficult to convince the American farmer who produces foodstuffs that he would not gain by destroying the cotton-textile industry in this country.

In my consideration of this measure I have not been unmindful of the failures which have been met in previous attempts of Congress to relieve the distress of the farmers. I voted for the appropriation of $500,000,000 which was made in 1929 for the relief of agriculture. I then had some misgivings about the success of the proposal. I was never convinced that we could change by legislative fiat the laws of supply and demand. Experience has again shown that to be true. My only hope in supporting that measure was the possibility of affording some relief to agriculture through the organization of cooperatives and some sort of marketing arrangements which would give to the farmer the full benefit of the price of his product. That, in a measure, I think, has resulted; but clearly every attempt to fix prices of actual commodities has met with abject failure. I am convinced that the provisions of the pending bill, looking to similar action, will meet with a like failure and will leave the farmer in a worse plight than that in which he now finds himself. Not only that, but the burdens which will be imposed upon the other three fourths of our population will be unbearable if my analysis of the bill is in any way correct.

We speak of the necessity of increasing the buying power of the people of the Nation. I wonder how that is to be done if, as I understand the provisions of this bill, we are to raise the price of foodstuffs to the consumers. It is to be borne in mind that approximately 32 percent of the wages of the people engaged in industry goes to the purchase of food. If that be so, and I do not think it will be denied, then manifestly if this bill becomes a law and the price of foodstuffs is doubled, it goes without saying that people engaged in industry must either devote twice as much of their earnings to the purchase of foodstuffs, or reduce their consumption to one half the volume they now use. I am convinced they will not do the former. Rather will they limit themselves, and in limiting themselves the markets for farm products will be destroyed, at least to a very considerable extent.

And so I have reached the conclusion that this bill will not benefit the farmer. Then too, as was well stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] in his argument yesterday, the allocation of costs to the various States offsetting the benefits to the farmers in those States, is worthy of very serious thought. For example, the State I have the honor to represent, will pay into this fund from 75 to 100 times as much as it will receive back. The farmers of Rhode Island themselves will pay approximately as much as they get out of it, and the urban population of my State will pay 7½ millions of dollars without any corresponding return.

While I have not studied the measure with the view of satisfying myself as to its constitutionality, I am not unfamiliar with some of the cases to which reference has been made in the course of this debate, and I have reached the conclusion that it will not stand the test of constitutionality if submitted to the Supreme Court for an opinion.

Throughout this special session of Congress I have repeatedly said to my constituents that I desired to support the administration in the measures it proposes, in the hope that some relief may come to the people of this country. I have done that insofar as it has been possible for me to reach the conviction that those measures would be beneficial. If I could be convinced that this bill would benefit the country in any way, or benefit any considerable group of our citizens without doing a most serious injustice to all of the other groups, I should hesitate to oppose it; but my conviction is that its enactment is not going to be beneficial to that class of our citizens in whose interests it is proposed, and most assuredly it will impose very onerous burdens upon the great majority of the citizens of the country.

Because we are faced with an emergency there is no valid reason why we should disregard all the lessons of the past. It will not serve any useful purpose to have action without knowing what will be the result. It were better to know the probable effects of any action we propose to take before taking it than to be forced to the necessity of retracing our steps later on out of the morass in which I am convinced this measure is bound to lead us.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I shall vote against this measure so long as there are contained in it parts 2 and 3.

I regret that I am obliged by my conscientious convictions to vote against this measure, because such conduct might imply that I am not in sympathy with the objectives of the measure, whereas in fact I would support, and if I had the intelligence to do so I would draft a measure that would accomplish those very objectives, namely, the limitation of production and the elevation of the purchasing power of agricultural products.

There are two main reasons why I cannot vote for this measure in its entirety.

In the first place, I am firmly persuaded that in letter and in theory these two parts of the measure to which I object are unconstitutional.

The other reason is that if this law were so put into operation in the wisdom and the sacred regard for the Constitution which characterize that great man who is now our Secretary of Agriculture, and in whom personally I have great confidence, so as to avoid the faults which are written out plainly on the face of it, and which permeate the theory of it entirely, it is my opinion that it would bring utter disaster to that great class of our inhabitants for whom it is designed, the farmers of this country.

I hope, in the few moments which I shall take of the time of the Senate, to adhere to those two grounds of objection to the enactment of the bill. As to the first one, regarding its constitutionality, I am not criticizing any other Member of the Senate when I take the position which I do take here regarding the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the measure which is before the Senate for adoption. I feel bound to exercise my very best judgment at the first opportunity to ascertain whether any and every measure which is proposed in the Senate will stand the test of constitutionality, and if, in my opinion, it does not bear that test, I feel conscientiously bound to oppose the passage of the measure, and not to pass it up to the judiciary to determine that we have enacted a law which is unconstitutional.

Mr. President, I find myself not taking a new position in that regard. I cite, for the consideration of Senators, a very distinguished authority for that stand. I call attention to what a President of the United States stated, and I refer to William Howard Taft, in his veto message to the Congress on February 28, 1911. This was a veto message on the

Webb-Kenyon bill. I read a short extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD proceedings of the Senate at page 4292, as follows:

It is said that it should be left to the Supreme Court to say whether this proposed act violates the Constitution. I dissent utterly from this proposition. The oath which the Chief Executive takes and which each Member of Congress takes, does not bind him any less sacredly to observe the Constitution than the oaths which the Justices of the Supreme Court take. It is questionable whether the doubtful constitutionality of the bill ought not to furnish a greater reason for voting against the bill or vetoing it than for the Court to hold it to be invalid. The Court will only declare a law invalid where its unconstitutionality is clear, while the lawmaker may very well hesitate to vote for a bill if of doubtful constitutionality because of the wisdom of keeping clearly within the fundamental law. The custom of legislators and executives having any legislative function to remit to the courts entire and ultimate responsibility as to the constitutionality of the measures which they take part in passing is an abuse which tends to put the court constantly in opposition to the legislature and executive, and, indeed, to the popular supporters of unconstitutional laws. If, however, the legislators and the executives had attempted to do their duty, this burden of popular disapproval would have been lifted from the courts, or at least considerably lessened.

For these reasons, and in spite of the popular approval of this bill, I have not felt justified in signing it, because I feel that under principles of proper constitutional construction it violates the interstate-commerce clause of our fundamental law.

Mr. President, I adopt that as a clearer and better statement of my position than I can make myself, and, being under that conscientious devotion to duty, I could not, even in the name of emergency, support a measure which, like this, has glaringly set out on the very face of it and in its very language unconstitutional provisions or provisions which violate in their exact words the simple terms and provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, it is not necessary to construe its words or to seek the objective of this legislation in order to find this bill in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. It expressly transgresses that clause of the Constitution which forbids the laying of any tax or duty upon articles exported from any State.

The learned Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] adverted to that subject yesterday and cited a case. I have no conflict whatever with the position he took, nor do I disagree with the case he cited. It is true, in my opinion, that that section of the Constitution relates to goods which are transported without the dominion of the United States and is not applicable to those transactions interstate. So there is, in fact, no conflict between him and me in this respect.

My objection is that by subdivision (b), found on page 23 of the proposed act, a bond is required "satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury for the faithful observance of the provisions of this title requiring the payment of taxes" from any person who wishes to export, in the sense of the interpretation by the Senator from Alabama; that is, transport without the United States any of these commodities or any commodities which are in competition with them. That part of the bill is not subject to the claim that it does not relate to exports, because it says it does relate to exports, in the following terms:

Upon the giving of bond satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury for the faithful observance of the provisions of this title requiring the payment of taxes, any person shall be entitled, without payment of the tax, to process for such exportation any commodity with respect to which a tax is imposed by this title, or to hold for such exportation any article processed wholly or in chief value therefrom.

There is no need of trying to interpret that. It means the processing of an article that is to be transported across the Canada line, or across the Atlantic Ocean, or across the Mexican border, or across the Pacific Ocean. All the men who are exempt from the power of Congress to tax must, under the terms of this bill, give a bond to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States that they will conform to the terms of this proposed law; and those terms are extraordinary. Not even in time of war have there been any terms of any law which equal these in exposure of the people of this country to the tyranny of one individual.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to have the distinguished Senator point out where there is any provision in the bill which would lay a tax or a duty upon exports. The Senator's objection to the bill formerly was that it violated clause 5 of section 9 of article I of the Constitution, which prohibits the imposition of a duty or tax on articles exported from any State. I take it the Senator does not claim that because a processor is put under bond when he is engaging in the export business that he will not sell the goods elsewhere on account of not being required to pay the tax; that then there is no duty or tax placed upon the exported article; and the bond to which the Senator refers, I doubtless assume he will concede, is for his protection, because of the fact that the export tax does not apply.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield that I may ask for a quorum? I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield for that purpose?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I think, if the Senator does not insist upon it——

Mr. LONG. I certainly hope the Senator will let us have a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, at the time when a quorum was called an interrogatory had been propounded by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who asked, as I recall, what part of this proposed law laid a tax upon any goods that were to be exported from any State. My answer now is that that part of the bill providing for a tax lays such a tax as I have indicated. That provision will be found on page 10, section 9, of the bill. It requires no particular acumen to understand the bond provision of the bill with respect to exported goods, and clearly to observe that if no bond shall be given, then the goods will not be exempt from the tax, because the only condition in the bill which prevents such goods from taxation is that a bond shall be filed by the exporter.

If it needs any further interpretation, one has only to turn back one paragraph to find a provision for refunding of taxes already paid on exported products of a State. However, take other provisions of the bill, which have been so ably argued here already and which I do not intend to reargue, and consider how they will operate. We discover that it is perfectly clear that this bill cannot operate as to intrastate transactions, because Congress has no power to regulate commerce in intrastate transactions. We see, of course, as I have tried to point out, that it cannot operate as to exports from a State, because no tax can be levied by Congress on exports from a State. Therefore, this bill must be so administered by the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture as it shall apply only to interstate transactions.

Now, Mr. President, theoretically apply the measure to such transactions, and where do we arrive? We arrive at one of the major reasons why the bill should not pass and become a law, and that is that in the commerce conducted inside the boundaries of every sovereign State no tax can be collected upon the commodities transported in such commerce.

For instance, take milk. Can Congress collect a tax upon the producers of milk in the State of Massachusetts who sell their milk within the confines of that State? Oh, no; that is absolutely prohibited by the Constitution; and the great Secretary of Agriculture will not try to enforce any such collection. If, however, he should do so, do you think, Mr. President, that the citizens of Massachusetts would pay the tax? I am suggesting the thought that there would be a conflict over the execution of this proposed law in the State of Massachusetts. On the other hand, the milk producer in the State of Vermont who undertakes to market his milk in the city of Boston, which is one of his largest markets, must pay the tax. In other words, there is a tax on Vermont milk in Boston and there is freedom from that burden for milk produced in Massachusetts and marketed in Boston. I ask whether that is going to produce a stabilization of the price and of the buying power of milk in New England? Senators know the answer. And when that situation is extended to every commodity that may be classed as one of the basic commodities included in the bill, and to all the substitutes therefor, I suggest to the consideration of the Senate that that kind of commerce will be thrown into chaos. It was to prevent just that kind of chaos and to obviate disaster to the farmers of the country and to all its liberty-loving citizens that the great convention which met in Philadelphia framed the Federal Constitution, which we are now invoking.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I say to the Senator, confirming the hypothesis which he now lays before the Senate, that the very able ex-Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Blaine, takes practically the same view, and has said to me that the milk producers of Wisconsin now contemplate the complete loss or the possibility of the complete loss of their Chicago market as a result of this legislation, if it shall be enacted?

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the Senator from Michigan for his suggestion.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. With reference to the question of the power of the United States to deal with intrastate traffic, has the Senator considered the application of the rule employed in rate making by the Interstate Commerce Commission? I have in mind the Minnesota Rate cases and the proposition that the Interstate Commerce Commission may properly regulate intrastate rates as an incident to the power to regulate interstate rates. Does the Senator feel that that principle has application here?

Mr. AUSTIN. It is some time since I read those cases, but I have read them; and I am familiar, I believe, with the principle upon which those decisions rest. They rest upon the ground of the public service and the public welfare and upon the peculiar control which the Government has over the transportation of persons and goods. They are not parallel at all with the proposition of reaching over the boundary of a sovereign State and saying, "I will tax your transactions of purchase; I will license your contracts of sale; I will put in the penitentiary all who do not conform to my regulations prescribing how the business inside State lines shall be conducted."

Mr. STEIWER. In other words, the Senator is contending that the difference is in the diverse character of the two proposals?

Mr. AUSTIN. I believe so, Mr. President. The rate cases obviously are affected with a public interest. In respect to the products of the farm the only way we can possibly save our faces in undertaking to enact such a bill as would regulate their transportation in interstate commerce by a tax upon them is to declare and to force through the proposition that farm products in interstate commerce are also affected by a public interest. To that I do not agree, and that ought to be one reason for opposing this bill, because I understand the bill expressly declares that doctrine in its opening paragraph.

Since the question has been asked, I wish to add to the list of serious cases, well considered, which already have been put in the RECORD here, supporting the proposition that the Government of the United States cannot exceed the powers which have been vested in it by the sovereign States. The people of the country who ordained that Constitution were the people of the sovereign States. It has been so first, last, and all the time. They retain in themselves the great reservoir of power, and Congress only has those powers which have been delegated to it. When they delegated to Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States, they said to all the world, "We save unto ourselves the power and the right to regulate the commerce within our sovereign States respectively." The Supreme Court of the United States, which they set up as that unique feature of our form of Government to have the exclusive, final, absolute word upon whether a law transgresses that power, said in this case which I wish to add to the other cases in the RECORD—that is, the case of Bailey v. Drexel Furniture Co. (259 U.S. 39), as follows:

> Out of a proper respect for the acts of a coordinate branch of the Government—
> Meaning the Congress, of course—
> this Court has gone far to sustain taxing acts as such, even though there has been ground for suspecting from the weight of the tax it was intended to destroy its subject.
> But in the act before us the presumption of validity cannot prevail, because the proof of the contrary is found on the very face of its provisions. Grant the validity of this law and all that Congress would need to do hereafter in seeking to take over to its control of any one of the great number of subjects of public interest, jurisdiction of which the States have never parted with and which are reserved to them by the tenth amendment, would be to enact a detailed measure of complete regulation of the subjects and enforce it by a so-called "tax" upon departures from it. To give such magic to the word "tax" would be to break down all constitutional limitation of the powers of Congress and completely wipe out the sovereignty of the States.

Mr. President, I have referred to my own dear State. I cannot help but recognize the traditions of her people, her remarkable history of independence, and her wonderful struggle against hostile neighbors and against the Continental Congress and against British tyranny in order that she might found in the Green Mountains a republican form of government. I cannot fail to take cognizance of the fact that we are inspired by the spirit of those pioneer forefathers who carved out an independent republic which endured for 14 years, carried on its own public affairs, coined its own money, conducted international negotiations, financed its own army, contributed a well-equipped and very dextrous regiment to the Continental Army, and by means of international negotiations known as "the Haldimand negotiations" kept 10,000 British Regulars north of the Canadian line for 2 whole years until Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown.

I cannot forget, as I sit here and try to do my duty humbly, that there is nothing more sacred to them than the sovereignty of the little State of Vermont, and any attempt to break down the safeguards which they erected in that Constitution excites me to battle. I predict that any attempt to enforce this bill when it becomes a law, as the indications are that it will, by the collection of a tax, by the levying of a license against an individual, by the imprisonment of a Vermont citizen on account of anything that he may do which is the sole jurisdiction of the Government of the State of Vermont, will meet with that opposition, which will be effective. Of course, it will be by due process of law, but it will be determined; and I believe that every other State in the Union will take the same position and will fight for its rights as a sovereign State and will not submit to any dictatorship being placed over the power and the right of the citizens of its State to contract among themselves freely and to transfer from one to the other their own property. I believe they will resist to the last ditch any attempt by the Federal Congress to lay a direct tax upon the stocks of merchandise in their warehouses and in their grocery stores throughout the several States.

That is another feature of the bill which I regard as a direct violation of the Constitution. That is another feature of the bill which undertakes to shear away from the several States a power that is very essential to them and which must be saved unto them in order that they may be able to operate their governments effectively, for they must have the right of direct taxation. We cannot take it away from them by an act of Congress unless we do it in the manner pointed out by the Constitution, and that is by the method of apportionment according to the census.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire to inquire of the Senator in order that I may be certain that I understand his contention. Do I understand the Senator to contend that it will be impossible for the Secretary of Agriculture to require of the processor in Kansas a license before he can process the wheat grown and sold to him by a grower in Kansas?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is my interpretation of the bill—that is, if it is executed according to the Constitution. On the other hand, if it is executed according to the letter of the law and according to its theory he can do so, and then the Kansas taxpayer will probably assert his rights.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator contend that it is impossible under our Constitution for the Congress to enact any law that will force upon a processor in Kansas the necessity for taking out a license before he can process the wheat grown in Kansas?

Mr. AUSTIN. That is my contention.

Mr. HASTINGS. If that be true, it may be necessary for the Kansas wheat grower to transfer his wheat to some other State in interstate commerce before it can possibly be brought within the terms of the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes, Mr. President, that is my theory, and that is one of my objections to the bill. Although there is much to be said upon it, I have said enough.

Let me now consider the conditions generally as they stand today in this country with reference to like commodities produced in other countries. Of course, it is natural for a person who lives right close to a friendly foreign country to consider the competition that flows over the line. We all know—it is a matter of public knowledge, it is a matter of common knowledge, every workman in this country knows, every employer of labor in this country knows, and every consumer knows—that all of the protection which was designed by tariffs for our labor and for our producer has been borne down and in some cases destroyed by the difference in the value of our gold dollar and the sterling pound.

Senators have noticed a gift from someone, laid on our desks within a few moments, a copy of the Saturday Evening Post for April 15, 1933, of which there should be one in every family, in which the leading article, written by Garet Garrett, calls emphatically to the attention of the world the fact that against the economic pressure of all the countries whose dollar or whose other unit of exchange has been depreciated we have nothing, not even a compensating tariff in the United States, to protect and defend the commerce, the industry, and the labor of this country. He quotes on page 36 from a bulletin of the Department of Commerce, which I wish to read, as follows:

> Imports of many commodities are increasing, particularly of dutiable or largely competitive products. * * * Commodities numbering 232 were imported in greater volume during 1932 than in 1931. Of this number, 75 were free of duty (largely noncompetitive products), and 157 were dutiable (largely competitive products). * * * Imports accounting for 18 percent of the total value of dutiable goods were received in increased quantities.

The writer calls attention, Mr. President, to the fact that the first result of that tremendous change in the situation is bad, namely, the lowering of the price which we are trying to support in part by this bill; but he also points out an evil that is still greater than that, and that is the promise or the threat of an increase in that condition, and he quotes from the Department of Commerce as follows regarding that. I suppose one could not summon here to the Senate a more reliable witness upon the fact than the Department of Commerce, could he? It is as follows:

> The extent to which import competition in our domestic trade has developed during the past year, as a result of depreciated currencies, is not an adequate indication of the potential development. * * * With conditions as they are today—more than half of the world's trade being carried on by depreciated-currency countries and stocks of important raw materials and foodstuffs exceedingly large—costs of production and prices in gold-standard countries tend to seek the levels prevailing in nongold countries. Until the costs of production and prices of some of our commodities are further reduced, or some tariff adjustments are made, imports should tend to supply an increasing proportion of our domestic needs.

And right in the face of that condition, which I say is known to every one in this country, we have to consider a bill of this character, which lays an additional burden upon the producer and upon the processor in this country in his competition with foreign goods!

Of course, this bill contains a provision that the man who will be the dictator of its administration may lay upon the imported product a tax similar to the tax that is laid upon the domestic product; but what provision is there in this bill or any other bill which will put the domestic products in a position of fair or equal competition with the foreign product which is now getting in here over the tariff wall as a result of the depreciated currencies of foreign countries? Absolutely nothing.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, what was the Senator reading from?

Mr. AUSTIN. I was reading from page 36 of the Saturday Evening Post, which someone brought in here a few moments ago. I had previously read that article, and was struck by those facts, because I think they are evidence to be taken into consideration in determining the policy of passing this bill.

What I am trying to say is that in this condition of affairs, in this general depression, and in this special depression of agricultural products caused by the competition of such products from abroad, we now have a bill introduced to increase the chaotic conditions of commerce and agriculture. We have a bill introduced which is going to provide one price for the Government cotton—and that is a large quantity, and will last for a long time—and another price for the cotton which the grower sells from his farm; is it not? Yes, indeed. We are going to bring about that result because we expressly exempt the Government cotton from this tax, and do not exempt the grower from this tax. We are also going to have two different prices on cotton for the reason that the cotton which is transferred from the producer to the processor in the State where it was grown is exempt from this tax by the Constitution, and if the Secretary of Agriculture administers this law according to the Constitution—as we are promised he is likely to do—those transactions will be free from the tax, and we will have a tax-free price in that State; but over the border, in the next State, where that cotton is transferred to a processor, we will have another price, because there the tax must be added.

That is true of every one of these commodities. There will be two prices—the domestic price, using the word "domestic" as meaning intrastate, and the foreign price, using the word "foreign" as meaning the price in interstate commerce. Add to that this international confusion, and I submit that in the administration of this bill by any intelligent man who designs to prevent the bill from transgressing the Constitution of the United States there can be but one result on the farmer, and that is further disorder, further chaos, further instability in his price level; and goodness knows that every one of us here desires something else, and that that is what we should be glad to vote for if we had the opportunity to do it.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate further.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Has the Senator any suggestions along the line of farm relief which he thinks would give the farmer these benefits?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I stated earlier in my remarks that I professed no special skill; that I wished I did have the intelligence to devise a measure that would stabilize farm prices, that would increase the purchasing power of farm products, and that would limit the production; but I cannot offer any such suggestions. Unfortunately, I have not the honor of being a member of the committee to which this matter was referred. I would readily accept a measure which was experimental, as this is declared to be, if it were apparent that it would help the farmer, provided it did not clearly and on its face transgress the Constitution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. In other words, the Senator confesses that he has no plan at all, he has no idea as to what will be helpful, but he is against this plan, and will be against any other plan unless it is apparent in advance that it is helpful and beneficial and sure to be constitutional, and unless he is sure that it will be workable, and sure that it will be practicable, and sure that it will be popular, and sure that it will be something else.

Does the Senator think we will ever solve the farm problem, or any other problem, if Senators approach such questions in the mental attitude of the Senator from Vermont—one of negation and of opposition?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I realize that that question is not a fair question. Nevertheless, I shall try to answer it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon. If the question is unfair I withdraw it.

Mr. AUSTIN. No; the Senator from Texas need not beg my pardon in that connection. I think I am able to understand the implication of that question, which charges that the state of mind of the Senator from Vermont is not favorable to aiding the farmer.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no, Mr. President! I think I have a right to have the Senator yield to me. The Senator says my question is unfair. Therefore, I withdraw it. I do not want to be under the implication of propounding an unfair question.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator may withdraw his question, but the Senator from Vermont is going to reply to it.

I say that I am not competent, and I know it, to do the thing suggested by the Senator from Texas; and I am not willing to go out before the people of the United States and support a measure which I feel certain is destined to damage my neighbors.

I will say that I have seen tried with some degree of success a measure of cooperation in the marketing of farm products which did tend to stabilize the price and to raise its level, and I favor that; and if I stay in the Congress of the United States I am likely to try as best I may to attain that objective by some other measure which will be constitutional, and which will seem to me more likely to accomplish the objective. What I am trying to do here at this instant, however, is to interpose such objection to the passage of this measure as I have uttered here, because I believe that the paramount thing for us to do is to save the blessings of liberty to our people, and to keep government free at a time when the excitement of a great people, caused by distress and suffering, has such an appeal to our emotions that it may sweep us off our feet and make us do things which, upon sober consideration, we would not do.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if some other Senators desire to speak at this time I do not want to debate my amendment, for which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] has offered a substitute. I gladly will yield the floor, because I do not want a vote taken this afternoon, and I am not anxious to have the Senator from Montana speak to the very light membership that has stayed around the Senate on this late Saturday afternoon. I would rather hear from some other Senators on this farm legislation for the remainder of the evening, or I would rather suggest to the Senators from South Carolina and Arkansas and Oregon that they consider the question of taking a recess at this time.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if no Senator is desirous of speaking on or pressing the amendment, or the substitute for the amendment that has been offered, I think we ought to address ourselves to some of the other amendments. There are quite a number of them here that should be disposed of.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I should much prefer to do that. I had intended to speak today, but I was not able to get the floor earlier in the day because of the fact that other Senators did. It is late now. This is an important subject, and many Senators are absent who want to be here when it is discussed. I should much prefer not to be compelled to go on and speak this afternoon.

Mr. LONG. The Senator will not be compelled to go on this afternoon, because I can speak a while myself.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate, nor do I want to do anything which will prolong the discussion. I do not intend to speak for a long time, but I do want to speak Monday, when we are apt to get a vote on it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there are a number of perfecting amendments.

Mr. SMITH. That is what I had reference to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Those amendments may very readily be disposed of, and I think will not require a great deal of time. I think we ought to consider them, and then perhaps it will be approaching the time when we shall discontinue the session for the day.

If the Senator will permit me at this juncture to offer a perfecting amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. LONG. I have no objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair assumed that the Senator from Louisiana had yielded the floor.

Mr. LONG. I had, but I understand that my amendment is before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is temporarily laid aside for the consideration of other amendments.

Mr. LONG. I have no objection to its being temporarily laid aside for the cosideration of other amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment:

On line 2, page 17, of the bill, after the word "title", insert the following:

and expansion of markets and removal of surplus agricultural products.

Mr. President, the effect and purpose of this amendment are to broaden the use permitted by the proposed statute of the funds acquired under the bill, so that a portion of the same may be used for expanding markets. I think the purpose will meet with general approval.

Mr. SMITH. Let me understand, Mr. President. The purpose of this amendment is that part of the proceeds of the tax collected may be used for the purpose of expanding our markets in foreign countries?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. That has been brought to my attention, and there was an amendment other than this one—of course, I shall not object to the pending amendment—looking toward putting a tax on certain articles for that specific purpose. I shall not object to the adoption of the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will have to read it. I propose to add the words "and expansion of markets and removal of surplus agricultural products."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is that calculated to affect wholly the surplus, over and above the domestic consumption?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Where is the tax to come from; is it on the processor?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. From processing products domestically consumed or importations of products?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The provision is attached to section 12. The language is:

The proceeds derived from taxes imposed under this title—which would mean, any kind of tax imposed under the title may be used in addition to the payment of the benefits under the administration expenses for this additional purpose.

The suggestion was made that the language employed in the amendment should be "such other purpose as shall, in the discretion of the Secretary, affect the purpose of the Secretary of Agriculture under this title." I thought it better, however, to propose to amend in this restricted form. It is not a probability that a greater proportion of the proceeds will be used for any other purpose than those originally stated in the bill.

Mr. McNARY. The contemplation of the proposed act is that a processor's tax will go to the farmer in order to guarantee him the difference between the current base price and the current average price and the base price pre-war, 1909 to 1914. If that be true, there will not be any money left for the purpose of exporting any surplus to foreign markets, and, without additional provisions, it occurs to me that the Senator's amendment would be wholly futile to accomplish the purpose which he now indicates.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should like to have the amendment incorporated.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest that the amendment be studied further and let the Senate take up another amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have been requested to offer the following amendment—and it seems to me to be a good one—on page 11, after line 12, to insert the following:

No processing tax shall be levied under this law on articles purchased by a State or political subdivision thereof for use solely in the exercise of an essential governmental function.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is not in order unless the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to is reconsidered or unless the Senator desires to ask unanimous consent that notwithstanding that vote, his amendment may be considered.

Mr. SMITH. Taking the parliamentary suggestion of the Chair, I ask unanimous consent as indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the amendment he has just offered may be considered notwithstanding the previous adoption of the committee amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. I probably shall not have any objection, but I want to ask a question of the Senator from South Carolina. His amendment reads:

No processing tax shall be levied under this law on articles purchased by a State or political subdivision thereof for use solely in the exercise of an essential governmental function.

What does the Senator mean by that latter expression?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as explained to me, there might be certain food products, or certain clothes, which it might be essential for the State or a subdivision of the State to purchase, either for those in its eleemosynary institutions or its penal institutions, and the tax should not be imposed in such cases.

Mr. McNARY. Does the Senator mean contributions to the poor by the Red Cross, for instance, of flour or bread or pork or cotton goods?

Mr. SMITH. Wherever it is essential for the use of the State.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator is doing the thing attempted to be done a moment ago. He is proposing to reduce the processing tax, which may not, according to my opinion, be adequate to do the things the Senator wants done, namely, to give the farmer his pre-war purchasing power.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture will certainly be conversant with the terms of the measure, and he can so regulate this processing tax as to take care of whatever is incorporated in the bill.

Mr. McNARY. He certainly cannot do it at all. That processing tax is fixed; it is just as definite as words could make it, namely, to add to the average price the value the farmer received for his products from 1909 to 1914. They cannot get any higher than that, and when the farmer has reached the ultimate price, it stops there, and there is no more money to come from the processing.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, my colleague from Oregon, who collaborates with me perhaps as sympathetically as any other member of the committee, knows that in connection with this bill we worked for a long time over one section that would give the Secretary the right, within the exercise of the power delegated here, to take into consideration unemployment in the cities, the amount of the reduction in any given article where the tax had reduced the consumption, and so forth and so on.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator well knows that he has a right to decrease the tax from the maximum period, but he cannot go above the purchasing power which the farmer had during the base period.

Mr. SMITH. But I am calling the Senator's attention to the fact that the Secretary has the power to determine what that amount is during the period selected. Who is to determine it but his experts and those who have sent us in tables? I have one which I am going to put into the RECORD.

It seems to me, without quibbling over this, that where a sovereign government, such as a State or a subdivision of a State, wants to purchase certain necessary articles for use by the State in its penal institutions or its eleemosynary institutions, things which are carried on every day, they should not be forced to pay this tax.

Mr. McNARY. I have just one purpose, and that is to keep inviolate the source from which the farmer is to receive his benefit, and I know, and the Senator from South Carolina knows, that there is a maximum benefit he can receive. There is a maximum charge that can be made against the processor, and that is as definite as can be, and beyond it we cannot go. But if there is a diminution in the sale of commodities by reason of this tax, it can be lowered by the arbitrary power of the Secretary of Agriculture.

If we are to make exceptions, and let eleemosynary institutions have some of these articles for nothing, if we are going to use part of the money for exporting wheat and cotton and other basic commodities mentioned in the bill to foreign markets, we are going to deplete the sum until we will not have the required amount of money in the fund to give the farmer the benefit the Senator is now holding out to him. That is the only interest I have in the proposition. There is a limited fund, and why draw upon it to make exceptions which will be repeated from day to day?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, all of us understand both the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas and the one I have offered by request. They raise a question which we could debate here for some time.

There are some men who are tremendously interested, have tremendous investments in certain articles produced in this country, a major portion of which is exported, and they have said that they believe that, with what assistance Congress could give, they would levy a tax voluntarily on their goods in order to create a fund to be used for the purpose of exploiting American goods in foreign countries. In connection with the amendment introduced, coming under a farm relief bill, with the Senator from Arkansas, I thought that if we could find that we could use some of this tax money to better advantage in expanding foreign markets than we could in reflecting it in the domestic price, it might be well used, and, by the same token, the people pay the taxes for the States and the subdivisions thereof, and if we could relieve the taxpayer to the extent that we used these goods, we would be aiding the farmer and a part of the taxpayers as well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator how the processor is to know that the commodity he is processing is intended ultimately for some of these favored municipal agencies?

Mr. SMITH. When an order is given, it would be very easy for him to ask for a remittal of the fund to that amount.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In other words, he would have to get a refund?

Mr. SMITH. A refund.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator does not figure that he has further complicated the situation and made it almost incomprehensible?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the question ought to be put as to whether there is any objection to the consideration of the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. LONG. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the Senator this question: The Senator from Michigan has suggested what appears to me to be the difficulty with this amendment, which is this: We have to have a deadline by which to enforce the collection of the processing tax. If a large quantity of goods is not to come within the processing tax, how are the penal provisions to be enforced? A man comes in with a shipment of milk and he does not pay the tax. His defense is that he intended to sell it to the charity hospital. Another man comes in with a large amount of cotton goods, and he does not pay the tax. His defense is that he intended to sell it to the State penitentiary. Another man comes in with a large shipment of flour, and he does not pay the tax. His defense is that he intended to sell that flour to the asylum for the insane. The Senator would add further complication, which I do not think we could enforce, even if we could enforce the complications now in the measure.

Mr. SMITH. The bill as it stands provides for the machinery whereby on whatever is exported abroad there will be a refund; on whatever proportion the producer exports he will get a refund. It is a very easy matter. When an order as large as a State or subdivision of a State would send in were given, the State perhaps would get the refund and the subdivision would get what it was entitled to through the State. It will be a very easy matter to ascertain on what proportion of the goods the tax was paid or what was diverted, and to pay the refund on that proportion.

Mr. LONG. But how is a man going to know that those goods are bought for convicts at the penitentiary? He has got to pay the processing tax when he manufactures cotton goods, he has got to pay the creamery tax when he makes the butter, and he has got to pay the processing tax on the hog when he kills it. How does he know when he gets the bacon cured and smoked and salted down that 3 months later it is going to be sold to a charity hospital?

Mr. SMITH. If it is thus sold a rebate will be paid.

Mr. LONG. Does the amendment provide that the State shall get a refund?

Mr. SMITH. It amounts practically to the same thing. It says there shall be no tax on it.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to ask how when this refund is granted it will be possible to know its amount? As I understand, the tax will vary from day to day. Say, the tax on cotton is 7 cents today and 8 cents tomorrow and a State buys some cotton goods; now, would anyone know the amount of the tax on the particular goods the State bought on which a refund would be made under the bill?

Mr. SMITH. The tax would be computed on the day the order was issued; the tax would be levied according to the cost of the material on the day the order was given.

Mr. CAREY. Then, would the manufacturer have to keep track of the raw material in order to know what the tax was?

Mr. SMITH. Not necessarily. He would know what he had to pay on the raw material, and out of the raw material he would make certain goods to order, and would file his claim for refund according to that.

Mr. CAREY. But the tax would vary from day to day.

Mr. SMITH. Suppose it did; the order would not vary from day to day. On whatever day the order was made, I assume, the claim for the refund would be based upon the cost of the material on that day.

Mr. CAREY. I cannot see how the manufacturer would know just the amount of the tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has to be considered by unanimous consent. The debate is more or less out of order unless there is consent given to the consideration of the amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment printed, so that we may have notice of it before it is considered, and therefore I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware objects.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it seems to me that it is not worth while for us to be quibbling over it. We understand the principle, and, if necessary, I can offer the amendment to a part of the bill that has not been passed upon; I can offer it to another part of the bill, because it certainly is germane to any part of the bill. So I will just ask the clerk to insert the amendment at any appropriate place in the bill which we have not considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina offers an amendment to be inserted at the proper place in the bill. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert in the proper place in the bill the following:

> No processing tax shall be levied under this law on articles purchased by a State or political subdivision thereof for use solely in the exercise of an essential governmental function.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina knows that I am supporting this bill. Other Senators have raised the question of the impracticability of the administration of the drawback and all that. I desire to raise the more fundamental questions: Why should we exempt States and eleemosynary institutions? Why should we make exceptions of anybody under this proposed law? We are proposing to pass an act to raise the price of agricultural commodities, and at the same time it is proposed to make preferences and discriminations. That, in my opinion, is unsound. Why should any State government buy something from the farmer at a lower rate than I buy it from him or you, Mr. President, buy it from him?

Mr. SMITH. For the reason that the charitable spirit throughout the country caused us to give about 250,000,000 bushels of wheat and about 3,000,000 bales of cotton to the Red Cross. Why should we donate such commodities free of any benefits to the farmer? The fact of the business is that it was detrimental, because the 250,000,000 bushels of wheat were used for purposes that ordinary wheat in the market would have been used for and the 3,000,000 bales of cotton came in competition with the cotton being produced by the planter. That is why.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CONNALLY. In just a moment I shall do so. Let me answer the Senator from South Carolina. He wholly misses the point that I undertook to make. He is complaining that we gave away wheat and cotton to the Red Cross and thereby hurt the farmer's market. Now the Senator from South Carolina is proposing to increase the misery of the farmer by providing that charitable institutions and States and subdivisions of States shall buy the farmer's goods more cheaply than an individual or other institutions may buy them. I think there should be no discrimination.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me, I do not want him to interpret to me what the amendment proposes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator will have his own time. I do not want to take up too much time. I have yielded to the Senator once.

Mr. SMITH. In this connection I do not want the Senator to misinterpret my spirit toward the Red Cross and the effort to aid people who needed help.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is this a bill in aid of charity or is this a bill to raise the price of agricultural commodities?

Mr. SMITH. It is a bill to aid the farmers of the country, and I am simply asking that a provision be put in the bill under which, along with the main idea, the States—and we all know that it is a notorious fact that the farmers pay the taxes—will not be charged a double tax, a tax on the processing and then a tax on what they use for State institutions.

Mr. CONNALLY. That goes to the fundamentals of the bill. If it is unjust to tax the States and charitable organizations in behalf of the farmers, then it is unjust to tax you and me and everybody else in favor of the farmer.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield first to the Senator from Oregon, who asked me to yield a few moments ago, if he now desires me to do so.

Mr. McNARY. I want to make this observation: The amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina refers only to States or political subdivisions thereof. I say the Red Cross is neither. We are dealing not with charitable organizations; we are dealing with political organizations for political reasons. It is a noble sentiment which the Senator from South Carolina so eloquently expresses; but if he wants it written in the bill, he had better change his amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say that the statement of the Senator from Oregon does not change my attitude at all. If we are going to pass this bill, it ought to apply to everybody—States, subdivisions of States, and everybody else.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say to the Senator from Texas that I thoroughly agree with what he has said and I want to ask him this question: Would it not be just as reasonable to exclude all persons earning under $10 a week and each having five people to support as it would be to make the exemption provided by the amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure it would. It would be just as reasonable to say, "Provided, however, That no man who has but one leg shall be taxed on any bread he buys, and he shall get a refund of the tax he pays because he has only one leg and is crippled and cannot work", and so forth and so on. We might just as well say, "Provided, however, That all widows that have been married twice or all women who have sorry husbands shall be exempt from paying any tax because to pay it will be a hardship on them." We might just as well say that all poor folks shall not pay any tax and we shall tax only bread and food that the rich have to buy. It is wholly inconsistent with the purposes of a bill of this kind to make exemptions of Tom, Dick, and Harry.

Mr. HASTINGS. It certainly ought to include the unemployed; they ought to be exempted.

Mr. CONNALLY. Surely it ought to include the unemployed.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator, if he will allow me, it did include the unemployed—this very bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. If it does, it only makes the bill more vulnerable.

Mr. SMITH. It did include them in the first draft, because it provided that before the tax was fixed there should be considered the number of unemployed and the ability of the people to buy the commodity.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator keeps on whittling, he will not have any bill or any processing tax left.

Mr. SMITH. I have not whittled at all. I have simply tried to make it as acceptable as possible. I have not made much headway, but I am still trying.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator will whittle his bill away if he permits great numbers of people to evade the processing tax, because the processing tax is the heart of the bill. We are either going to have a bill that will do some good and will work or we are going to have just another old makeshift bill for the farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that there is already an exemption in the bill providing for a refund of this tax. I read from the bill, as follows:

> (c) Any person delivering any product to any organization for charitable distribution or use shall, if such product or the commodity from which processed, is under this title subject to tax, be entitled to a refund of the amount of any tax paid under this title with respect to such product so delivered.

Mr. CONNALLY. That ought to be taken out of the bill.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me first answer the suggestion and then I shall yield. Mr. President, if we want to give anything to charity, the way to do it is to go down in our pockets and give it. The Government has given the Red Cross cotton and wheat and commodities of that kind; and if we are going to pass a law to exempt from it everybody who has some particular plea, then we are not going to have any law that will be worth very much when we get through with it. It is all right to talk about charity, but let us not legislate charity out of other people's money. If we want to give something to charity, to the Red Cross, give it to them out of our pockets or out of the Treasury if that is desired, but we make this kind of legislation a cheap affair when we exempt this fellow and that fellow. The result will be we shall destroy it by exemptions and exceptions.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LONERGAN. On June 22, 1932, the House of Representatives passed a joint resolution amending the Revenue Act of 1932 and providing an exemption in the case of articles used in the exercise of governmental functions. I read the joint resolution, as follows:

> That section 621 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:
> "(3) To a State or political subdivision thereof, in the amount of any tax under this title which has been paid with respect to the sale of any article purchased by it for use solely in the exercise of an essential governmental function."

As I have said, that joint resolution passed the House of Representatives on June 22, 1932.

Mr. CONNALLY. What act did it propose to amend?

Mr. LONERGAN. The Revenue Act of 1932.

Mr. CONNALLY. Notwithstanding the merriment of the Senator from South Carolina, that is a wholly different situation from that which now confronts us. That amendment had reference to a tax law passed under the Constitution for taxation purposes and for the maintenance of the Government. That is a different thing from passing a bill levying a processing tax, which has nothing on earth to do with the general expenses of the Government but is for the benefit of some particular industry. Under the Constitution the Federal Government cannot lay a tax on any State agency for the purpose of collecting revenue from that agency to support the Federal Government, and, of course, that is why the act to which the Senator referred was enacted. McCulloch against Maryland, an early case of Judge John Marshall on constitutional powers, laid down the principle that the Federal Government cannot tax the agency of a State nor that a State can tax Federal agencies; but when a commodity is being sold to a State just as it is being sold to everybody else and at the same price at which it is sold to everybody else, the State is not being taxed, nor is the agency of the State being taxed.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know that I understand just how it is proposed that this amendment shall work. I gather from what has been said that it is proposed that there shall be refunded to the processor the amount of the tax. I do not see how it will work. I want to know what becomes of the tax after it goes to the processor? Does he keep it, and thereby make a profit by the amount of the tax over and above what he would otherwise have made?

Mr. CONNALLY. I assume the Senator from South Carolina will contend that he would hunt up the individual from whom he bought the product and give him the benefit of it.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not see how it will work.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator will have to ask the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not known what portion of a commodity is going to be sold to a charitable institution when it is processed, and, therefore, of course, it cannot be exempted at the time it is processed. After it is bought by a State, the State will have to make a refund to someone. Does the processor get that refund?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to know what becomes of it. I agree with the Senator from Texas that there ought to be no exemption of that kind.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Kentucky. While I cannot answer his question as to where the refund would go, I think his observations emphasize the objections which I am urging against making any exceptions.

If we should adopt an amendment of this kind, it might be necessary to brand articles so that they might be traced to their ultimate source. Where is this pair of cotton underclothes going to be sold? Is it going to be sold to a State? Nobody knows. And when the State finally buys that pair of underclothes for one of the convicts at the State prison farms, it has got to be traced to where it came from. The State bought it from a retailer, perhaps, and the retailer bought it from the wholesaler, and the wholesaler bought it from the factory; and more money would be spent tracing the source of one pair of cotton underclothes than would be obtained by the processing tax.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. That seems to be true, but another thing I should like to suggest to the Senator is that the tax is on the individual who produces any commodity which has been processed. If we are going to exempt anyone from the payment of the tax, why should we not exempt the individual citizen rather than the State or the county?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think the Senator was not in the Chamber a while ago when the Senator from Texas undertook to suggest that there was no reason on earth why, if we are trying to raise commodity prices, the commodities should be sold to a State or county at a lesser price than is made to one of its citizens.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I rose a moment ago with the intention and purpose of explaining the provisions of the bill in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Texas. I am in accord with the philosophy of the Senator. I am opposed to the exemption. The tax is paid by the processor. If the purchaser is given a rebate or refund, of course that would go back to the processor and he would then be relieved from the payment of that amount of processing tax. That is the basis of the processing fund.

Mr. CONNALLY. But it would have to be traced back to the original processor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CONNALLY. When the State bought a pair of overalls for one of its convicts it would have to go back and find the factory that actually made those overalls.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true. The Senator wanted to know who gets the tax, and so far as the provisions of the bill are concerned I wanted no one to misunderstand them.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. So far as I understand the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, it would have nothing to do with the processor nor with the producer on the farm. In other words, the State or municipality that purchased the goods would pay the tax and make application to the Treasury for a refund. There is no other way for them to get the refund. In effect the refund would come out of the Treasury. The Treasury would not be able to go out and collect from the farmer to whom the processing tax was paid.

Mr. CONNALLY. It would have to come out of the processing fund in the Treasury.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; that is true. The Treasury having paid the farmer, it cannot go back to the farmer and collect it again.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am opposed to the exemption.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not think it is workable.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is not workable and it is not sound. One thing about the drift of the Government today is that the trend is to exempt Bill Jones and Sam Smith. Why should not everybody stand on the same level? We want to do this for this group and that for that group and the other for the other group, and interest and enthusiasm are generally measured by the size of the group and the number of people in the group who may vote at the next election. There is no reason on earth why a State or county should be exempted from paying the same price for wheat and bacon and sausage and every other agricultural product that Bill Jones, who is a taxpayer and a citizen, has to pay. There is no reason for it.

I am not hostile to the bill. I am not hostile to the Senator from South Carolina. I am going to vote for the bill. But let us make a bill that is sound and that is workable. Let us not put on its forehead at the very outset a blazing brand that it is unfair and discriminatory and merely a little gallant gesture to the farmer that "we have been promising to do something for you for 12 years, and we have not done it, but here we are going to do something for you again", and then fill it up with a lot of contradictions and exemptions and denials of its efficacy at the very outset.

I hope the Senator from South Carolina will withdraw his amendment. It is unsound. If we are going to exempt cities and counties, why not exempt municipalities? Why not exempt irrigation districts? Why not exempt school districts? Why not exempt road districts? Why not exempt railroads? Why not exempt the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Some Senator asks me sotto voce if I think the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a charitable institution. Yes, I do! [Laughter.] I think it is charitable to the extent that when we get through with the Reconstruction

Finance Corporation the Government will own a lot of railroads, and it will own a lot of banks that have played out and handed over to the Government a lot of old notes that nobody will ever be able to collect. I think the life-insurance companies are going to unload on us a lot of bad debts and obligations. I believe we are going to have mortgages and debts against a lot of other corporations.

Mr. President and Senators, as I observed on the floor some time ago, since the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has come into existence promoters and others are busy trying to work up some new scheme to get the Government to finance it, when they never dreamed of having such a project financed in normal times out of normal money.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. Does not the Senator recognize it is the greatest three-ball institution in America?

Mr. CONNALLY. It has not the sound judgment of the man who hangs out three balls. The man who hangs out three golden balls in front of his shop sees to it that we put up a dollar's worth of security in order to borrow a dime. [Laughter.] He gets his money back. We have to leave our watch in his shop until the money is forthcoming.

I am not attacking the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as it is constituted. I am not blaming the members of the Board. I am blaming the conception of the plan. I am blaming the scheme that Mr. Hoover and those who voted for the bill devised. Everybody was taught to believe that the Government was to be their "uncle." It was said, "Come up and get all you want." The Board is not entirely to blame. They think they are under the mandate of Congress and they will tell anyone so. "Congress passed this bill and said we had $3,500,000,000 to loan. We were told to loan it. Congress told us to loan it to certain concerns that were eligible." Consequently they are loaning it. They are probably performing their duties with greater industry than any other department of the Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. COUZENS rose.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield again to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. We all understand the Senator's viewpoint of the qualifications of the members of the Board, because they have at the head of the Board one of the finest men from Texas. There is no question about it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think the Senator from Michigan, who is ordinarily most gracious and considerate, ought to advance the implication that because I said the Board was not entirely to blame I had reference to the fact that one of its members is from Texas. It is true that one of the members of the Board is from Texas.

Mr. COUZENS. I am complimenting him. I am not condemning him. He is the finest man I ever knew from Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. Entertaining the estimate that the Senator from Michigan evidently does of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its member from Texas, and considering his knowledge and estimate of the junior Senator from Texas, and then his statement that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has as a member of its board the finest men he ever knew from Texas, I am rather at a loss to know just where the Senator from Texas stands in the estimation of the Senator from Michigan.

But that is mere pleasantry. Seriously, I am glad to have the Senator from Michigan testify regarding the member from Texas. I have a very high regard for the member of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from Texas, but I did not have him in mind when I said the Board is not to blame. He is only one member of the Board. He could not control the Board. I understand, in fact, that he has been in the minority on many of the issues, with which the Senator from Michigan is no doubt more familiar than I.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Board is composed of seven members, is it not?

Mr. COUZENS. It is skeletonized now to all Democrats.

Mr. CONNALLY. They have a very able member from Arkansas and an able member from New York. They had the former Vice President of the United States, Mr. Dawes, who is a neighbor, of course, of the Senator from Michigan. I am not criticizing the personnel of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I am criticizing the system. It is the wrong system. I am not defending them, because I do not know about all their loans. I am criticizing the policy of making Uncle Sam the banker for the rest of the people in the United States, because we are going to rue the day. On final settlement the Treasury of the United States will be the loser by a billion or more dollars, and Congress and our people will have to liquidate a lot of the concerns that are borrowing.

I am glad to yield now to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sorry the Senator did not yield earlier, because I did not want him to get into a battle with the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, Mr. President, that is impossible!

Mr. COPELAND. The other day the Senator from Michigan said he thought more of a Democratic Senator than any other Senator in this body. I asked him who that Senator might be, and he said it was the junior Senator from Texas, who is now speaking. He even intimated to me that he would lend the Senator from Texas money!

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from New York that nothing would impel the Senator from Texas ever to draw the sword, intellectually or otherwise, against the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH. After that statement?

Mr. CONNALLY. After the statement or before the statement, I shall say to the Senator from South Carolina. The Senator from South Carolina comes from a State that is always bristling with belligerency. He seems to be thoroughly saturated with the traditions, the fussy, quarreling, fighting qualities of South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, Mr. President, I should prefer not to yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I have been enjoying the speech of the Senator from Texas up to this time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator from South Carolina deny the fine and splendid traditions of South Carolina as being willing to fight whenever she felt like it?

Mr. BYRNES. I was objecting solely to the "fussy" part. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. When the junior Senator from Texas cannot speak without both Senators from South Carolina inserting their objections into the middle of his speech, I think the fair implication is that South Carolina is fussy! [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I regret the Senator from New York made the observation he did with reference to the Senator from Michigan because of the inability of the Senator from Texas in any wise to express in fitting terms his gratitude to the Senator from Michigan for what the Senator from New York reports as having been his sentiments.

I am sure the Senator from Michigan is aware of the limitations of the Senator from Texas to express the very tender and high regard which he entertains for the Senator from Michigan. Having been a member of the Senate Finance Committee with the Senator from Michigan for some years, the Senator from Texas has learned to place a high valuation on his ability, his integrity, his courage, his character, and, above all, upon his fine personal qualities.

Mr. COUZENS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sure the Senator from Michigan now will not only lend money to the Senator but actually give him money. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. No; the Senator from Michigan has many possessions, but I regard his money, of which he has much, as the poorest one of them. The Senator from Michigan knows that the Senator from Texas does not want any of his money.

The Senator from Texas does not even want to borrow any of his money; and the Senator from Texas, notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from New York, has no idea on earth that if he did he would be able to get any out of the Senator from Michigan—not because he would not feel impelled to do it, but because, entertaining as the Senator from Michigan does and as the Senator from Texas does the belief that a loan never ought to be made unless there is adequate security, the Senator from Texas would not be able to meet the requirements of eligibility. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH rose.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. No; I am just waiting for the Senator from Texas to get through. I desire to speak in my own time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas was about to conclude, and he thought the Senator from South Carolina wanted him to yield. The Senator from South Carolina has used some little time on the bill heretofore; and I did not realize that his standing in juxtaposition to the Senator from Texas here, in a rather belligerent attitude, was really a threat as to what little time I am undertaking to consume. Does the Senator desire that I yield?

Mr. SMITH. No; I just wanted to preempt the floor to keep others from getting it in case the Senator from Texas stopped.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say that the Senator is not entirely without success in that regard.

Mr. President, there ought not to be any exemptions in this bill. There is no reason to exempt States or counties or municipalities or charitable organizations or cripples or widows or anybody else if it is going to work. I oppose the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, every time I attempt to do a kindly deed, I catch the dickens. [Laughter.] A new Senator brought that proposal to me, and I wanted to help him out. It looked to me like a reasonable thing, and about the easiest way in which I could show him that I appreciated his efforts to try to add something to the bill. Therefore, I did not mention his name, and assumed all the violent wrath that has been poured on my devoted head. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I think the Senator misunderstood the spot where that wrath was poured.

Mr. SMITH. Anyhow, it was wrath.

Mr. CONNALLY. It was not poured on his head.

Mr. SMITH. Well, that would have been the most vulnerable spot [laughter]; and I thought the Senator had such a keen appreciation of a battle that he would instinctively know the vulnerable spot.

This request was made, and in good faith I have presented it; but in listening to this debate, if it may be called that, I am reminded of what Josh Billings told his nephew. He said, "My son, come to the Capitol and see how great an amount of conjecture they can get out of so little fact"; and that characterizes most of these debates.

I still think that there is in this amendment that I have offered an element of equity; and I have done the very best I could for my new, unfledged comrade on this floor. I do not think it will detract anything from this bill. The fact of the matter is, Mr. President, that if time were not so limited, I might have taken occasion to point out in this bill provisions to which there may be greater allegiance with less justification of fact than could be found in this amendment.

I am going to take the time of the Senate to call attention to the fact that for 24 long years I have not only worked here for the farmer, but being one myself and having suffered all of the intolerable ills of Federal legislation, I think I can speak with some authority. I have worked, and am working now, for the benefit of the man who makes his living solely and entirely by his efforts in the field. He is now losing the power to do other than keep body and soul together. It is notorious that on the farms and on the cotton fields in the South the negroes and the whites have actually patched their overalls until they look like one of these jigsaw puzzles. [Laughter.] I defy any man from the South to rise up and contradict that statement. They are making so much cotton that it has lost the power of even giving the fellow who makes it a suit of overalls, just as the wheat people have made so much wheat that 12,000,000 of them have to get in the road and go hungry.

Then we are accused here of trying to inject into a bill for the benefit of the farmers something that would take something away from them. They are down to the irreducible minimum now. To exempt the institutions enumerated in my friend's proposed amendment would not have subtracted one nickel from the power of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

Mr. LONG. I begin to see more virtue and logic in what the Senator has been saying. I notice that on page 19, in subdivision (c), all the things that are sold to charitable and eleemosynary institutions are exempted. The subdivision reads:

> Any person delivering any product to any organization for charitable distribution or use—

Without reading further, he is entitled to have the tax refunded. That is a great deal broader than the exemption to the State.

Mr. SMITH. Do not mention it, and start another outpouring of sympathy for the man in the field. I am supposed not to have any.

I heard a man say the other day that he had planted, I believe, 3,000 acres; and I wondered how in the name of God he ever got to Washington, if he had that much liability.

This amendment was a simple request to this body to exempt States and municipalities in the discharge of their sovereign functions from paying the tax.

Mr. President, I fear that if I should go on I might make an assault with intent to make a speech, and I might not be convicted on the evidence after I did so; but I do not feel disposed to go any farther with this matter. I am willing now to have a vote taken, and let us try to get to the farmer the blessings that are in this bill that will relieve him of his ills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. COUZENS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Carey	Logan	Russell
Bachman	Clark	Lonergan	Schall

SENATE

MONDAY, APRIL 17, 1933

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Savior, who in Thy earthly life didst reveal the innocence of perfect holiness and, like some river born among the snows in the sunshine of the mountain top pouring its transparent waters into the turbid, tumultuous current of our humanity, didst refresh us by the love and purity of God; grant that we may know the joy and power of Thy resurrection, as through the avenue of sense we behold the earth mantling herself anew in robes of loveliness.

In the conviction of our immortality, set us free from the worldly tyrannies that bind us, and from every disposition to be cowardly and mean, that we may be consecrated to each new duty that confronts us, thus binding ourselves by a new chain to eternity, strong and confident in Thee, for Thou hast said: "Fear not; I am the first and the last; I am He that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore." Amen.

5-DAY WEEK, 6-HOUR DAY—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the morning business the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 18, regulating the hours of labor, was passed, and at not later than 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p.m. the Senate proceed to vote on said motion without further debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I did not hear the latter part of the Senator's request.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I requested that at not later than 1:50 o'clock p.m. the Senate proceed to vote on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; at 1:50 p.m.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request as modified? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

IN THE LEGISLATURE OF THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA, ELEVENTH SESSION.

Senate Joint Memorial 4 (by the committee on mines, manufacturing, and labor)

To the President of the United States, to the Congress, and to the Committees on Labor in the House and Senate of the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, has learned with consternation that Alaska is included in the provisions of a bill introduced into the Congress of the United States by Representative CONNERY known as House bill No. 2867; and

Your memorialist respectfully represents:

That more than 95 percent of all laborers in Alaska are employed in seasonal occupations and that the average working hours for the year do not exceed 4 hours per day;

That more than 25,000 of these laborers are engaged in the fishing industry covering a coastal distance of more than 3,000 miles; that fishing operations in Alaskan waters are by regulation of the Bureau of Fisheries arbitrarily limited to a period less than 60 days for each season, which obliges the fishing industry to concentrate the year's effort within that short period, involving the production of some $50,000,000 worth of fishery products; that 80 percent or more of the revenues of the Territory are derived from the fishing industry; that many of the companies have operated at a loss for the past 2 years, and the enactment of the proposed legislation would compel them to discontinue operations, and the Territory of Alaska would be bankrupt and unable to support its schools, dependents, and indigent persons and to continue other essential activities;

That more than 6,000 laborers are engaged in the placer-mining industry in Alaska, covering an area of 590,000 square miles; this work is also seasonal and laborers are employed not more than 120 days during the year. Most of the mining is carried on by individuals or small companies in isolated places who employ less than 10 persons each, and it would be impossible for them to continue mining under the proposed schedule;

That the remaining wage earners, not exceeding 2,000 persons, are engaged in lode mining and other industrial pursuits throughout this vast Territory, and their employment does not exceed an average of 50 hours per week;

That workmen who are engaged in seasonal vocations will be deprived, under the proposed law, of the employment to make it possible for them to sustain themselves and their dependents and will be forced to leave the Territory and seek employment elsewhere;

That the extension of the proposed enactment to the Territory of Alaska would be ruinous to our industries, our canneries would be compelled to cease operations, most of our mines would be closed, unemployment would be greatly increased, and our Territory reduced to a state of bankruptcy and our people to want; Now, therefore, your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in the eleventh regular session assembled, most humbly and respectfully petitions and prays that the Territory of Alaska be exempted from the operations of House bill No. 2867 and all similar legislation limiting the hours or days during which any industry in Alaska may operate.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Passed by the senate April 4, 1933.

ALLEN SHATTUCK,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

AGNES F. ADSIT,
Secretary of the Senate.

Passed by the house April 4, 1933.

JOE MCDONALD,
Speaker of the House.

Attest:

C. H. HELGESEN,
Chief Clerk of the House.

A true copy:

AGNES F. ADSIT,
Secretary of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of the County of Los Angeles, Calif., favoring amendment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act so that work-relief projects may be provided for worthy unemployed residents who own homes or farms or equities therein, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Louisiana, praying for a senatorial investigation of alleged acts and conduct of Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate 2 memorials and 8 letters and 58 telegrams in the nature of memorials, signed by approximately 600 citizens of the State of Louisana and 4 citizens of the States of Illinois, Kansas, and New York, endorsing Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, condemning attacks made upon him, and remonstrating against a senatorial investigation of his alleged acts and conduct, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COPELAND presented the petition of members of the Buffalo (N.Y.) branch of the American Association of University Women, praying for the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols with no obstructive reservations thereto, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the East Buffalo (N.Y.) Real Estate Association, favoring the passage of legislation to equalize the cost of railroad transportation with competing busses and trucks " in order to save the railroads from ruin ", which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Young Women's Christian Association of Jamestown, N.Y., opposing the building of a larger navy, and favoring instead a constructive and needed public-works program, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted by a special meeting of Forest City Branch, No. 40, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Cleveland, Ohio, favoring the giving of work on routes to substitute carriers whenever the regular carriers are off duty for any reason whatsoever, and favoring the reestablishment of a 2-cent postage rate on first-class mail matter, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens, being employees of The Hazel-Atlas of New York, Inc., of Lancaster, N.Y., remonstrating against the passage of legislation limiting working time to five 6-hour days per week, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE TO AUDIT AND CONTROL THE CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE SENATE

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution (S.Res. 55) to investigate the delay in prosecuting alleged law violations by the Harriman National Bank, New York City, reported it without further amendment.

CLAIM OF SCHOOL DISTRICT 13, OKLAHOMA

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, during the last session of Congress there was passed by the Senate a bill for the relief of a small Indian orphan school in Oklahoma. It did not carry any appropriation, but authorized the Indian Office to pay out of the existing appropriation the contract price for taking care of certain orphan children. The bill passed the Senate in the closing days of the Senate, but did not get through the House.

A similar bill was introduced at this session, being Senate bill 73. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment Senate bill 73; and, if there be no objection, I will ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk report the bill; I am not familiar with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will report the bill by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 73) to authorize the Comptroller General to allow claim of district no. 13, Choctaw County, Okla., for payment of tuition for Indian pupils.

Mr. MCNARY. I inquire what is the amount involved?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It takes about $3,500 of an existing appropriation to be paid on contracts between the Government and the school districts for taking care of these orphan children. No new appropriation is required. It is merely designed to meet the requirements of the Comptroller General.

Mr. MCNARY. Is the money to be taken out of an unexpended balance or is it to be taken out of the tribal funds?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is a gratuity appropriation, I will say.

Mr. MCNARY. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MCNARY. And this bill has been reported favorably by the committee?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It has.

Mr. MCNARY. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was read, considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General is hereby authorized and directed to allow payment of claims of the public-school district no. 13, Choctaw County, Okla., for tuition of Indian pupils during the fiscal year 1931, in the sum not to exceed $3,435.61 from the appropriation entitled " Indian schools, Five Civilized Tribes, Oklahoma, 1931."

6-HOUR DAY, 5-DAY WEEK—MOTION TO RECONSIDER

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed; and under the unanimous-consent agreement the question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to reconsider the vote on the passage of Senate bill 158.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I understand the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to reconsider the vote by which S. 158 was passed is now before the Senate for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HATFIELD. I wish to address myself to that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I trust the motion to reconsider, offered by the able and patriotic Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], will prevail. I wish to support his motion by submitting before the vote is taken briefly a few facts which I believe pertinent and informing.

The representatives of labor have given serious thought to this legislation and favor it with a protective amendment, as do many industrial operators and owners who are anxious to assist in relieving the distressed and who have to my personal knowledge operated their plants for the last 2½ years for two purposes solely. First, to give their employees something in the way of work that will enable them to support their families; secondly, because the shutting down of many industrial plants means their utter deterioration and ruin. With these aims in mind they have continued to operate their plants notwithstanding they have suffered substantial losses each succeeding quarter when balance sheets are made up and invoice taken as to the financial status of the industry. There has not been a period in this industrial depression that the average industry, in my judgment, has not lost money.

To vote for this bill as it passed the Senate means that the loss to these industries would increase to an extent where this additional burden could not be absorbed. The same principle applies to the wage earner in that it means a reduction from one third to one half the paltry consideration he is receiving for what little work he is able to obtain at the present time.

The Black bill in its present form, instead of providing employment for our millions of unemployed workers, to my mind will actually force additional hundreds of thousands of American workers out of jobs.

I have been wondering if we, as a legislative body, are correctly appraising the proper relations of our own Government with the other governments of the world in this transitional period of reconstruction.

I wonder if those who are responsible for the conduct of our Government are approaching these difficult problems with the conviction that all the financial theories in the world brought together in one combined effort and inacted into law cannot redeem a single dollar of our national or individual indebtedness, or even put a part of the unemployed to work for any great period of time, financed by the Government, and by so doing bring to an end the direful industrial and economic condition that now confronts the American people at this hour. The brief executive messages advocating single pieces of legislation do not indicate the theory of reconstruction nor do they vision the entire plan of the present administration so as to enable us to answer the question, whither are we drifting and what type of government are we creating by this hastily prepared and briefly considered legislation?

The debts which are piled upon the backs of the American taxpayers as a result of our participation in the World War, and the obligations that have continued with but short intervals intervening, must be paid some day, in some way, and the greater the principal, the greater the burden of interest which now has reached the colossal sum of $700,000,000 per year, with an additional $400,000,000 per year for the sinking fund to redeem this debt.

I am wondering if these directors of our country's destinies are taking into consideration that these obligations made by law can only be redeemed by our toiling millions when gainfully employed and unhampered by the Government with numerous impractical laws.

We know that the rank and file of the American people not only have the courage, but the industry to work. What they most desire at this hour is steady employment, with a return worthy of their hire. If they can be secure in their employment, they will have the thrift and patriotism to pay the Nation's debt. We cannot do this, however, by giving to foreign labor their work opportunity here at home. The same results would obtain should this body adopt a law requiring one group of States, before shipping their products into interstate markets, to adopt a limited number of work hours and limit of days for a work week, as against another group of States that have an 8-, 10-, or 12-hour workday with 6 days per week.

It is true that all of the States will be alike affected by this law, but how about Canada, separated from the United States by an imaginary line, with a land area greater than our own, with no statutory limitation as to hours of work and that has a yearly trade with us of $327,000,000, largely competitive with our adjoining States.

It is, however, true that Europe and Asia would be even more destructive in case of the adoption of this law without proper protection to labor, due to the great depreciation in their currencies which have a much lower value than the currency of Canada. European and Asiatic currencies have decreased in value to the point where our tariffs are now ineffective. The results of this competition could be narrated by many within the sound of my voice if they desired to bear testimony. Outstanding examples of the ravages of depreciated currency are the condition of many of the industries of the Pacific States, especially the great State of Washington, where many industries there have been almost entirely wiped out.

Mr. President, I favor the principle advocated in limiting the hours for labor so that there will be greater work spread. It is a rational step; one that will assure results if properly safeguarded in the interest of both industry and labor.

However, I believe the road to prosperity for our common country in the years immediately ahead is to make it as nearly as possible self-sufficient, maintaining a proper balance between its basic industries and supplying its own orders. I am aware of the fact that this attitude is criticized by some as being narrow nationalism. A study of Europe's dilemma, almost impossible of solution, and a review of our own progress as a nation of people, justify this attitude from my viewpoint, and our experience with Europe during and since the war confirms it.

From conversations I have had with some Members of this body since the bill was passed, I am convinced that some were unintentionally misled into voting against the amendment which I offered and which was rejected by a vote of 41 to 39.

Section 482 of the Tariff Act of 1930, paragraph (a), reads:

> Every invoice covering merchandise exceeding $100 in value shall, at or before the time of shipment of the merchandise, or as soon thereafter as the conditions will permit, be produced for certification to the consular officer of the United States.

That is the existing law, and, so far as I have been able to learn, there has been no complaint that such certification was onerous. Incidentally, these restrictions were in force in 1913 and prior to even that date.

As an indication that the foreign producers are able to comply with requirements of American law and that they will be able to produce their merchandise on the basis of the 30-hour work week, if such requirement is made necessary, it might be well to call the attention of the Senate to section 481 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

Briefly, this section of the existing law provides that invoices shall set forth the destination of the merchandise, the place from where it was shipped, a detailed description of the merchandise, the quantities, the purchase price of each item, and whether the goods were sold or are consigned and, if not sold to the importer, the wholesale value of such merchandise.

These provisions have been in effect for more than 20 years. The additional requirement that goods seeking entry into the American market in competition with American-made goods should comply with the same restrictions which Congress imposes on products of American labor certainly will not permit of honest complaint on the part of any fair-minded person.

Mr. President, it will be noted that all merchandise imported must be accompanied by an invoice and that this invoice must be certified to by an American consul. It will be noted also that the present law requires:

> Any other facts deemed necessary to a proper appraisement, examination, and classification of the merchandise that the Secretary of the Treasury may require.

Naturally, if the Black bill is amended to require that products of foreign labor seeking a market in the United States be produced on a 30-hour-per-week basis they will be produced under the conditions Congress sets forth.

The amendment, which provides that the same restrictions apply to products of foreign workers as apply to products of workers of our own country, will not add any additional burdens to either the foreign producers or our consuls in foreign countries.

The Secretary of the Treasury will notify, through the State Department, our consuls in foreign countries that in certifying invoices the shipper of those foreign-made articles shall certify that the articles were produced by workers employed not more than 30 hours per week. This requirement is thoroughly in keeping with the provisions of the Black bill which impose on American workers and those American producers who seek the privilege of entering into interstate trade in our country a limitation of the 30-hour work week.

Surely it will not be contended that we should place such restrictions on the products of workers in each of our own 48 States and hesitate to place similar restrictions on the products of aliens in foreign countries, the products of which compete in the American market with the products of our own workers.

As an illustration, let me cite some specific cases. We have in my State the largest American factory devoted to the production of hand shovels. The factory is located in Parkersburg, which is across the Ohio River from the State of Ohio and only 100 miles from Pennsylvania. The Black bill, unless properly amended, will permit of foreign-made shovels, produced by workers employed from 40 to 60 hours per week in foreign countries, being sold in Pennsylvania and Ohio while the shovels produced in West Virginia cannot be sold in either Pennsylvania or Ohio unless the American workers are restricted to 30 hours per week. Is such legislation fair to our American workers and to our American industries?

One of the largest sugar refineries in Cuba is owned and operated by the Hershey Co. The Hershey Co., I understand, is owned entirely by American capital. This company, under the Black bill as it is now written, can employ workers in its Cuban refinery from 50 to 60 hours per week, and sell the product of these workers all through the United States in competition with products of workers employed in American refineries, where the workers, under the Black bill, would be restricted to not more than 30 hours per week.

Even without this added restriction on the products of American workers, I understand that refineries in Baltimore, in Atlanta or Savannah and Galveston, employing American workers, have been forced to close because even under present conditions they cannot compete with the American-owned Cuban product. What will happen to employment opportunities for American workers if we add to the advantages already possessed by this American concern, with its manufacturing plant located in Cuba, some 90 miles from our own country?

Less than a year ago Congress found it necessary to place an excise tax on imports of gasoline and its products in order to permit employment opportunities for American oil-field and refinery workers in America.

Should the Black bill be passed without proper amendments, it is only a question of a few months when those now employed in American oil fields and refineries will find it impossible to compete with products of oil fields and refineries of South and Central America.

The Western and Southwestern States benefit largely through the sale of wool used in American woolen and worsted mills. How many of these mills will be able to continue to operate, using American wools, working only 30 hours per week, in competition with the products of foreign mills, using foreign wools, working their workers from 40 to 60 hours per week?

What will happen to those workers of Maine, Michigan, Wisconsin, Washington, and other States now employed in the lumber and paper mills if American workers are restricted to not more than 30 hours per week, while Canadian mills are able to ship in the product of workers employed from 40 to 50 hours per week?

What, may I suggest, will happen to the employment opportunities of those American workers employed in the copper and metal mines and smelters of Michigan, Montana, Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, and other States when American workers are restricted to not more than 30 hours per week, while the products of the mines and smelters of Mexico, Canada, and other countries produced with workers employed from 50 to 60 hours per week are offered in the American market?

Mr. President, the illustrations which I have cited can be multiplied many thousands of times. I only recite these few instances to impress upon those who are giving me attention in my discussion of this motion the effect that the bill will have upon the industries that are to be found in every one of the 48 States of the Union.

In all sincerity, I ask, is it fair for an American Congress deliberately to enact legislation which will result in the loss of employment opportunities for American workers under the mistaken idea that because we call it a shorter work week it is beneficial to our workers?

I want to say that I do not believe there is an American wage earner today within the confines of this Republic who would be in favor of this bill as it passed the Senate if he knew what would happen to him with respect to his working opportunities, which it is very difficult for him to get at the present time, regardless of the wage that may be offered him.

Should we enact such legislation, especially with some 15,000,000 of American workers out of employment, when even the slightest consideration should indicate that our actions will force additional hundreds of thousands out of employment unless we make the restriction apply to all goods, whether of foreign or domestic production?

Mr. President, some Members of the Senate have contended that placing on products of foreign workers the same restrictions that are placed on the products of American workers may handicap the present administration in making reciprocal treaties with foreign countries.

Such a contention is so absurd that it is hardly worthy of consideration, even should the Congress abdicate its authority in treaty-making and authorize the President to negotiate and conclude such treaties.

However, in view of the fact that such thoughts may influence some Members of the Senate, permit me to suggest that the passage of legislation placing on the products of foreign workers the same restrictions that are placed on the products of American workers should make it much easier for the State Department to negotiate the contemplated treaties with foreign governments. With the legislation in force which I hope will be adopted, it will give the State Department something to trade with should they so desire. On the other hand, if we should pass the Black bill in its present form we would automatically make it harder for the State Department to secure those concessions which undoubtedly they have in mind at the present time.

Mr. President, I do not advocate, as some have contended, any embargo. Some Members of the Senate who have in the past indicated a hostility to legislation which would place the products of foreign workers under the same restrictions that the Black bill applies to products of American workers have openly advocated a complete embargo on the products of foreign agriculturists. Why not protect the purchasing power upon which the American farmer is dependent?

I do not seek to place any restriction on products of foreign workers different from those which we apply to products of our own American workers.

I have pointed out how, under existing law, the foreign producers, shipping products of foreign workers into the United States, must furnish an invoice certified by an American consul. If the Black bill is properly amended, all that will be necessary for the foreign producers seeking entry into the American market will be to employ their workers not more than 30 hours per week, and to have the American consul so certify. Such products will then be able to find entry into our country just as freely as they do now in competition with our home products.

I sincerely trust that the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that we will then be able to proceed properly to amend the Black bill in a way which will make it a real relief measure, and which will enable many to support it who cannot support it at the present time because, in our judgment, it destroys the work opportunities of American wage-earners to the advantage of those who are now largely in possession of our commerce and trade, which is responsible in part for the continued depression which exists under the American flag today.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire briefly to supplement the observations that have been submitted by the able and courageous Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], who always speaks in behalf of protection and in behalf of American labor.

I remind the Senate that I voted in favor of the 30-hour week bill. I believe in its general principle although I should prefer to express the principle differently. I shall vote for it again; but I shall also vote to reconsider for the purpose of permitting considered contemplation of the problem involved in the amendment which the Senator from Florida proposes to attach, and which, as I understand it, will duplicate the amendment which the Senate rejected by a narrow majority of one upon motion of the Senator from West Virginia when the bill was originally under consideration.

I submit, Mr. President, that those who believe in the theory of the 30-hour week itself ought to want this amendment attached. The 30-hour week would lose most of its charm and its attraction if it is accompanied by a reduction in wages proportionate thereto. The able Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], who sponsors this legislation, has repeatedly expressed his hope that the net result would not be a reduction in pay proportionate to the reduction in working hours; but how can a proportionate reduction in pay be avoided if we are opening the American market to a competition from foreign production that is not similarly restricted in respect to hours of labor?

There is not a Senator in this Chamber who would dare to propose to repeal or relax our immigration restrictions today. There is not a man who would stand upon the floor of the Senate and propose any such relaxation. Why not? Because that relaxation would bring into the United States new competition by way of foreign labor for the poor supply of jobs now available for our own men.

What is the difference between letting foreign labor come in and compete with us under our own flag and permitting their products to come in on a basis which puts our products at a disadvantage? The net result is precisely the same.

Therefore, I submit that at the very moment when we would deny any relaxation in immigration we certainly should deny any relaxation in other differentials which make it possible for us to retain such employment and such industrial activity as we still preserve for ourselves.

Mr. President, I submit that in the very theory of the shorter work week bill itself—namely, the theory that we are not to reduce wages but that we are to reduce time and maintain wages—it is necessary, for the protection of the genius of the bill itself, to attach the amendment which it is proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] to attach.

Mr. President, I call your attention to another thing:

We are working here on a farm relief bill. Under the terms of that farm relief bill we are proposing to increase the price upon agricultural commodities within the United States. At the same time we are providing in that bill that this increased commodity price index in the United States shall be protected against foreign competition by a proportionate increase in the tariff upon the related commodities. That is entirely appropriate. In other words, when we are dealing with agriculture we frankly confess our purpose to protect the opportunity of agriculture to enjoy these new benefits which we propose to give them. Will you tell me why, in the same breath, we should deny American industry and American labor the right to enjoy the benefits which we propose to give them under the shorter work week bill? Why are not those two problems upon a dead parity? Upon what theory do we propose to increase the agricultural advantage of the American farmer and protect him in that advantage against foreign competition, when in the same breath we propose tentatively to give American labor an advantage, and then decline to protect American labor against the type of foreign raid which would nullify and take away every single advantage which the shorter work week bill could bring?

Mr. President, I wish that the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] had reiterated to the Senate the telegram from Mr. Matthew Woll, of the American Federation of Labor, which he submitted on April 6, and which is found at page 1320 of the RECORD. I propose to read it again to remind the Senate of the fact that our task is only half done when we create the shorter work week. Along with the shorter work week, if it is to be in any degree a blessing, must go protection for the earnings which are possible by labor under the terms of that shorter work week program.

This is what Mr. Woll has to say on the subject:

> The pending 30-hour work week limitation to products of American labor will prove most harmful unless the bill is broadened to include those products of labor of foreign nations which compete in the American market with the products of American labor.

It seems to me that is an axiom.

> We fear that limiting pending bill to products of American labor will result in work being done in Canadian and foreign branch factories of American concerns as well as products of foreign concerns.

Mr. President, one can put his finger right on that hazard, and it cannot be escaped. One of the baneful things that has happened in the past decade is expatriation of American capital and its establishment of branch plants and mass production in Canada and other foreign nations. Is it not perfectly patent that if we put restrictions upon hours of labor within the United States without at the same time protecting our markets against imports not similarly limited we put a new premium upon the expatriation of American capital into branch factories, and that we have put a special premium upon the extension and the expansion of those branch factories established under other flags by way of production which otherwise might stay here at home? I continue reading from Mr. Woll:

> Therefore we respectfully request your forceful action toward the adoption of an amendment which will make the pending bill effective on all manufactured products entering into interstate sale, whether the product of American workers or the product of foreign workers.

That is just a plain, simple appeal for fair play and equality, for parity and a square deal as between foreign production and domestic production.

> Will appreciate your presenting these views and appeal to Members of Senate before final action on pending bill.

Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] ably presented those views. They have been supplemented by the presentation of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I rise only to say that I am voting to reconsider for the purpose of permitting the Senate to look this challenge squarely in the eye, and answer it on its merits, a thing which I fear was not wholly done before because of the very limited consideration that was given to it, although, in spite of that limited consideration, the roll call on the amendment submitted by the Senator from West Virginia stood at a tie vote, until one of our colleagues across the aisle changed his vote ere the announcement was finally made. The view of the Senate was that close upon preliminary presentation of the subject, and was that close to an adequate consideration of the American viewpoint.

I am voting to reconsider solely for the purpose of voting again to attach this amendment to the bill, and I repeat, so that there may be no misunderstanding about my views, that I shall then vote for the bill, with or without the amendment, but I shall vote for it feeling that it is infinitely more advantageous as a charter to American labor if the amendment is attached.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. I was interested in the observation of the Senator regarding the loss of advantage in the restriction of immigration which comes because of our admission of foreign products. As I understood the Senator, his argument was that whatever of advantage came to us from a restriction of immigration was lost because of the importation of goods produced abroad. I wonder whether it would not be better to permit immigration, rather than to permit the products of foreign factories to come into the United States, since, if we had immigration, we would at least have the consuming power of those who came here, and at the present time we do not have it, though we have the products with which to compete.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think the Senator's position is well taken. We both agree that America should be saved against all these hazards.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. HATFIELD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I want to say just about two words in connection with this question. I cannot see how any real friend of the bill will vote for reconsideration. If the amendment proposed could be placed on the bill, we know that the luggage would be too heavy to carry. So I hope that no one will be deceived into believing that he could vote for reconsideration and for putting that amendment on the bill, without at the same time, in effect, voting against the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. BACHMAN'S name was called). The junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN] is absent on account of the death of a friend, but he has a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE].

Mr. HAYDEN (when his name was called). On this vote I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay." If the Senator from South Dakota were present and voting, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. In his absence, not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on this vote, I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. I understand that if that Senator were present he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COPELAND (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair on this matter with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] and permit my vote to stand. If the Senator from Ohio were present and voting, he would vote "yea", and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 52, as follows:

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on Saturday last the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], now occupying the chair, introduced a joint resolution providing for the enactment into law of an informal agreement reached between the officials of the State of New York and the officials of the Federal Government concerning the allocation of power in the construction of the works on the St. Lawrence waterway. I understand that at the time the joint resolution was introduced the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] suggested that it should be referred to the Committee on Commerce. It is my understanding that the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations thought that the joint resolution should be referred to his committee. In view of the discussion which took place the joint resolution was permitted to lie on the table without reference. I seek now, Mr. President to invite the consideration of the Senate to the question of the reference of that joint resolution, and I want to make a brief statement in connection with it.

The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations held protracted hearings on the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. Those hearings were conducted by the subcommittee, of which the then chairman of the committee, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], was chairman. That committee heard, so far as I know, every witness, pro and con, concerning the treaty who indicated a desire to be heard. The testimony is exhaustive and covers a great many pages.

In the course of those hearings the question of the allocation of costs between the State of New York and the Federal Government naturally was brought before the committee. Representatives of the New York Power Authority, as well as representatives of the Engineer Corps of the Army and representatives of the State Department, were heard by the committee.

During the course of those hearings the late Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, suggested that it would be possible for representatives of the State of New York, through their power authority, legally constituted, and the Engineer Corps of the Army, to reach an informal agreement as to the allocation of cost of these works. Pursuant to that suggestion made by the late Senator from Montana there were informal conferences between representatives of the Government of the United States and representatives of the State of New York, and they finally presented to the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations the result of those conferences. The joint resolution introduced by the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations provides for the enactment of that agreement into law.

In view of this history of the proceedings with reference to the treaty, in view of the genesis of this agreement between the representatives of the State of New York, through their power authority, and the representatives of the Government of the United States, it seems to me that no Senator could have any question but that the proper committee to assume jurisdiction of the joint resolution is the Foreign Relations Committee, which has considered this whole matter from every angle, and through the activities of which this informal agreement was reached.

Furthermore, I may say, Mr. President, that the committee has at this session of Congress, by an overwhelming vote, reported favorably the St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty to the Senate; but it is important that this joint resolution should precede the consideration of the treaty by the Senate. Therefore, Mr. President, I am very hopeful, in view of this brief résumé of the facts which I have given to the Senate, that the Senator from New York will withdraw his objection to the reference of the joint resolution to the Foreign Relations Committee, and, in order to bring the question to a head, I move that the joint resolution be so referred.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am very glad to see the Senator from New York taking the position which he is taking in regard to this treaty. It is high time that someone was thinking about the commerce of the United States instead of about foreign commerce. When this treaty shall be ratified the only thing for those of us living in the Mississippi Valley and in the Eastern States to do will be to move to Canada, anyway. I understand that this treaty project proposes putting up about $600,000,000 of American money for the purpose of building up waterways and ports of Canada, so that the present advantage which they have will be more enhanced, to the point where we will have nothing but Canadian ports for America. With the flood-control work being needed to be done in this country as it is, with people down in Mississippi and Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and Illinois being inundated by the flood waters of the North, the proposal at this time to take $600,000,000 of public money to carry on a project to build up ports in Canada is not feasible. We have not had enough domestic consideration given to this St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. I am entirely in sympathy with the position of the Senator from New York, and think that we ought to have a committee which is studying the commerce of our own country to consider this matter, particularly as it relates to a contract between the State of New York and the Federal Government and to a contract which is proposed to be made for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada. I hope the Senator from New York, in undertaking to protect the welfare of his own State, will maintain his position and will see that this resolution, which is strictly a matter of domestic consideration, shall remain in the hands of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LEWIS. I have just returned from the Supreme Court of the United States, where a cause on argument compelled my attendance. May I ask the Chair to state what is the particular motion before the Senate as to the St. Lawrence waterway treaty, as I am interested in behalf of the State of Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to refer Senate Joint Resolution 43, relative to the distribution of the waters of the St. Lawrence River under the St. Lawrence Treaty between the United States and Canada, to the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask what is the issue, Mr. President? The motion is to refer the subject to the Foreign Relations Committee. Is there any other motion before the Senate to create an issue opposing such disposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the only motion pending before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the argument presented by the able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] seems to me to go to the question whether the treaty as a treaty should be ratified; but, so far as the particular question involved in Senate Joint Resolution 43 is concerned, it is now a part of the hearings and has been considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I cannot see why it should be separated from the proceedings thus far had in the Committee on Foreign Relations. It has been a part of the hearings; it has been considered by the committee; it will have to be considered in connection with the treaty when that document comes before the Senate; and why it should be taken away from the Foreign Relations Committee it seems to me rather difficult to understand. I take it that the Foreign Relations Committee will give as sincere and earnest consideration to domestic commerce. It is a subject which the Foreign Relations Committee has taken charge of under the jurisdiction which fundamentally belongs there, and it seems to me the joint resolution should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this is probably not the time to discuss the merits of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. Of course, I cannot conceive it possible that the Senate would vote to spend $325,000,000 of American money on an all-British canal at a time when we are reducing the pensions of veterans and the wages of employees. It would be very strange if we thought of doing such a thing. When the treaty comes up for consideration it will be demonstrated that it is so filled with provisions unfavorable to America that certainly it will never receive the favorable consideration of the Senate.

But the matter at issue is not the question of the treaty. It relates to what charge shall be made against the State of New York for the power developed in the international section of the St. Lawrence River. The matter at issue has nothing whatever to do with our relationship to a foreign country; it is purely a domestic problem. It was perfectly right for the Foreign Relations Committee to consider the treaty, to consider what should be put into the treaty with Canada, and to make an agreement regarding the terms of such a treaty.

But the series of resolutions introduced by the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and which have not been before us to be read until this morning, have nothing whatever to do with the treaty. Part of the language of the preamble is as follows, found on page 2 of the printed resolution:

> Whereas the United States engineers and the Power Authority of the State of New York have, as a result of a series of conferences, entered into a joint recommendation with respect to the allocation of cost of the works in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence River for power and navigation, which is embodied in a memorandum dated February 7, 1933.

There is not a Senator here, unless he be a member of the committee, who has ever read that memorandum. I live in the State of New York and in part represent that State in this body, but until I sent this morning to the Army engineers for a copy of that memorandum I never had seen it. I have it in my hand, and have had it in my possession about an hour. Other Senators do not know what is in it.

Why, as a matter of fact, should the Foreign Relations Committee have any power to deal with a problem purely domestic? Senators do not have to take my word that it is a domestic problem. When the treaty was transmitted to the Senate by the President—and what I refer to is found on page 7 of the hearings on the St. Lawrence waterway—the President said:

> The disposal of this power is reserved as a purely domestic question in the United States.

That was the statement of the President of the United States when he transmitted the treaty. The treaty related only to the international relationships and had nothing to do whatever to the disposal of power.

I find also in the statement of the Secretary of State in transmitting the treaty, as it appears on page 10 of the hearings, in speaking about power development, the following:

> This provision, of course, leaves each of the Governments free to settle the purely domestic question of utilization of water power.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator discusses the Foreign Relations Committee as though he thought it a committee of foreigners. I am quite at a loss to know why the Foreign Relations Committee cannot be trusted to conclude a contract with the power authority of his own State when that power authority, so far as I know, is in complete concurrence with the Foreign Relations Committee at the present moment. Do I misstate that so far as the Senator knows?

Mr. COPELAND. Of course the Senator from Michigan is facetious.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I am not facetious. I am intending to be very serious.

Mr. COPELAND. It is perfectly absurd for any Senator to suggest to another Senator that any committee of the Senate is made up of foreigners. I have no doubt about the loyalty and patriotism and qualifications of each and every member of the Foreign Relations Committee; but we have committees in the Senate organized for specific purposes. The Committee on Foreign Relations has nothing to do as a committee with domestic concerns, and of course nobody knows that better than the intelligent Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator knows I agreed with him last Saturday that his statement is scrupulously correct; that if this were a new matter, in my judgment, it would have no place in the Foreign Relations Committee. But I remind him again that after 3 months of work in constant and harmonious contact with the power authority of his own State the whole subject matter has been completely probed and surveyed and concluded, so far as I know, to the satisfaction of the Power Authority of New York. I am asking the Senator whether his quarrel over the reference indicates that I am right in my opinion that the power authority is dissatisfied with the treatment it has received or the conclusions which have been reached in contact with the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. COPELAND. No matter what may be the motive back of the question I shall answer as courteously and as responsively as I can.

The power authority is in favor of the resolution and, if I am rightly informed, prepared the resolution. At least I was told by the chairman of the power commission that this is what they desire. I said to him as frankly as I say to the Senate now, that this relates to a domestic question and ought to be referred to the Committee on Commerce. That is where it ought to go.

The Senator asks why. He spoke about the 3 months of effort on the part of the Foreign Relations Committee. I suppose I am almost the only Member of the Senate, outside of the distinguished members of that committee, who has read the hearings. I observe that the Senator from Michigan was assiduous in his attendance and faithful in his duties in connection with the hearings. I pay him that tribute.

I might say, too, as a matter of sentiment, that a few days before he left Washington, former Senator Walsh, of Montana, handed me his copy of the hearings and asked me to read the particular testimony which he had indexed on the front of the volume. He knew of my opposition to the all-British canal and he desired, if he could, to weaken my opposition. He said he was satisfied if I would read the testimony I would change my opinion regarding the matter. So it is with considerable emotion that I speak as I do this morning.

But we are not today discussing the treaty. We are speaking about what shall be done with the power incidental to the building of the all-British canal.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Having very great interest in the treaty because of its relations to the State of Illinois, particularly to the waters that surround the city of Chicago, which I and my honorable colleague represent here in this body, might I ask the Senator from New York or our able friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] what is the particular thing that is sought to be accomplished by the resolution? What is the particular subject matter upon which it enters and that is to be disposed of as distinguished from that which the treaty itself represents?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to enable me to answer the Senator from Illinois?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield for that purpose?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The resolution deals exclusively and solely with the contract that shall be made with the State of New York in respect to power if, as, and when a treaty is executed. The pending question has nothing to do with the merits of the treaty or the project. It is solely a modus vivendi under which New York and the Federal Government shall live in respect to the power contract if subsequently the treaty is ratified. The whole quarrel seems to be whether the resolution shall go to the Foreign Relations Committee, which has jurisdiction of the contract as well as the treaty heretofore, or whether it shall go to the Committee on Commerce, I assume for the purpose of starting the inquiry all over again.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from New York if he concurs in the response of the able Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not, and I will answer him in a moment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In what respect did I misstate the facts?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WAGNER. May I ask the Senator from Michigan a question? Is the Senator from Michigan of the view that because the Committee on Foreign Relations had under consideration this treaty between the United States and Canada, as it has jurisdiction over all treaties between the United States and other countries, that, therefore, that committee shall forever consider all questions that relate in any way to the carrying out of the treaty? For instance, in the event the treaty is ratified undoubtedly bills will be introduced providing for an appropriation to construct the dams or submerged weirs or whatever may be constructed in connection with navigation. Does the Senator contend that because we had hearings in relation to the treaty the Committee on Appropriations shall be divested of jurisdiction of that appropriation question, and that it ought to be referred for consideration to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the senior Senator from New York permit me to respond to his colleague?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly not; and I thought I had made it repeatedly plain that the only reason on earth why I joined the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in suggesting that this particular resolution should go to the Foreign Relations Committee is that all of the preliminary hearings and work and contract in respect to this specific phase of the matter already have been canvassed in that committee.

Mr. WAGNER. So have we in that committee canvassed the probable cost of construction of the whole project, the amount of appropriations that would probably be required in order to carry it out. The argument of the Senator from Michigan would apply equally to any appropriation bill that may be offered because we have had these preliminary considerations of the subject. I do not think it is sound reason for divesting of jurisdiction a committee we have established in this body to deal with purely domestic questions, where all questions of expenditure for the promotion of commerce have heretofore been considered. I hope my colleague prevails in his demand that the resolution be referred to and considered by a committee which has always considered such questions and of which he is a member.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the senior Senator from New York yield to enable me to ask his colleague a question?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The junior Senator from New York has been very frank. He will be equally frank, I hope, in stating that he hopes the entire subject matter can be postponed so far as any conclusive consideration in this session is concerned.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not understand the implication in the question of the Senator from Michigan. I am willing to trust the Committee on Commerce to do that which is for the best interests of the United States, just as I trust the Committee on Foreign Relations; but I say that merely because a committee has had preliminary consideration of the subject is no reason why thereafter it shall consider all phases of all legislation that may relate to subjects which have been heretofore considered by other standing committees of the Senate.

If I may say so to the Senate, I think it is rather a reflection upon the Committee on Commerce that it shall be divested of jurisdiction over this matter which, except for the fact that the Foreign Relations Committee has had hearings upon the treaty, would unquestionably have been referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator will be generous with me for just one further moment——

Mr. COPELAND. I will be, because I want to demonstrate to the Senator that I am not in a "quarrel" with him, as the Senator suggested I would be.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not in any degree interested in a quarrel over jurisdiction. It makes not the slightest difference to me which one of these committees should have original jurisdiction over this matter. I am interested in proceeding to a conclusion in the matter with the least possible delay; and I submit that with the contract completely surveyed, with the entire satisfaction, so far as I know, of the Power Authority of the State of New York, from my point of view it is nothing but needless delay to institute a new hearing of the entire subject matter.

I am not reflecting at all upon the motive, or impugning any motive, or implying any motive in respect to the reference to the Committee on Commerce. I am saying as a matter of cold fact that the reference to the Committee on Commerce means a substantial delay, and that is the sole reason why I am opposed to it.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WAGNER. I suppose the Senator also contends that if legislation is proposed making an appropriation to carry out some of the provisions of this treaty or this agreement, that legislation ought not to be sent to the Committee on Appropriations, because perchance they may have to inquire as to the merits of the proposed legislation.

Mr. COPELAND. And consequently would delay action.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator knows that that analogy is not accurate.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not know it. Of course, the Senator knows everything. I do not pretend to know nearly so much.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator knows that that statement is not accurate.

Mr. WAGNER. But there are some things that, with all humility, even I may understand.

Mr. COPELAND. Out of the abundance of his wisdom and knowledge, will the Senator from Michigan tell the Senate when it was that the Committee on Foreign Relations gave consideration to the material suggested by this joint resolution? In the hearings, did the Committee on Foreign Relations discuss how much the State of New York should pay for the allocation of the power privileges?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Committee on Foreign Relations, under the particular attention of the late Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, brought together the engineers of the Government and the engineers of the New York Power Authority, and as a result of repeated conferences, and as a result of at least three hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, in which both the power authority and the War Department engineers were heard, a tentative agreement was had upon a miximum of $89,000,000 in respect to this phase of the undertaking.

Mr. COPELAND. But at no time has the committee had before it the final memorandum of the two groups; has it?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The committee had the complete tentative agreement which the engineers were authorized to put into final form.

Mr. COPELAND. Did the committee have before it for study the report made by this joint committee of the engineers and the power authority? Has the committee had that before it?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Which report does the Senator refer to? We have had so many reports.

Mr. COPELAND. I refer to the one which is mentioned in the joint resolution before us.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think we did.

Mr. COPELAND. You did? Then why did you desire any further information or any further joint resolution?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No further information is necessary, but further authority is necessary.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am here to say that further information is necessary.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. I fear the Senator from Michigan, without intending so to do, has confused the subject; for it is my judgment, being a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and interested in the subject, that the Foreign Relations Committee have never investigated or had this subject before them. It was a subcommittee that had been appointed to listen to and investigate certain features to which I am sure my friend from Michigan is alluding.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is entirely correct.

Mr. COPELAND. And, as a matter of fact, the memorandum was not prepared until the 7th of February. It has not been investigated or studied by the Foreign Relations Committee.

Now, Mr. President, let me go into this matter a little farther. I want to explain why it is that I want this matter sent to the Committee on Commerce. The Senator from Michigan may in his heart feel that my only reason for doing so is to delay the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator permit me to complete one set of facts to which he has just adverted? I know he wants to be entirely fair.

Mr. COPELAND. All right; go ahead.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator referred to the fact that this memorandum was dated the first week in February, and inferred that the committee could not have had it before it because of that date. I remind him that our concluding consideration in the committee was the last week in February and the first week in March, and that we had hearings supplemental to the bound volume which the Senator has in his hand.

Mr. COPELAND. All the more reason, Mr. President, why there should be some leisure on the part of the Senate, some time taken, to consider supplementary hearings, if there are any such.

I am not surprised that the Senators from Illinois are interested. This is a very serious problem. Under this treaty, the United States abandons its ancient contention that Lake Michigan is an American lake. It gives it hereafter the same status as that possessed by the lakes on the international boundary. It puts Chicago and the State of Illinois absolutely at the mercy of Canada so far as the diversion of water through the drainage canal at Chicago is concerned.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. That is in direct opposition to the declarations of former Secretary of State Root, who in his official capacity made the announcement in behalf of this Government that Lake Michigan was a domestic water, and not one over which the Committee on Foreign Relations had any jurisdiction.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me warn the Senator from Illinois and his colleague that when this treaty is ratified by the Senate, Lake Michigan will have exactly the same relationship to Canada that the St. Lawrence River has today. A careful reading of the treaty will convince any fair-minded man of the truth of what I say.

Under the agreement which has been entered into between the engineers of the United States and representatives of the Power Authority of the State of New York, it is proposed that the State of New York shall pay $89,726,000 of the cost of this improvement—practically $90,000,000. As a citizen of the State of New York and one of its representatives in this body, I want to know whether that is a fair charge to make against my State for what it is to receive. As a Senator of the United States, I want to know if that figure is fair to my country.

The Committee on Commerce, presided over by one of the fairest and truest men in this body—the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]—has charge of problems like this, which have to do with river and harbors. It is that committee that has to do with flood control and power development. Why should an exception be made here?

My particular object in having this joint resolution referred to a committee competent by experience and authority to deal with the problems involved is that an economic study may be made. There is not any evidence of such a study in these hearings. Nobody knows how much the State of New York is going to suffer by the opening of the all-British canal. Nobody knows how much this country is going to suffer in its commerce by the development of the St. Lawrence route to the sea. There may be those here who are willing to have the port of Montreal—which now, next to New York, is the chief port of North America—made the chief port of North America. I am not. I am not interested alone in the commerce that goes out of the great port of New York; but I want the port of Boston, and the port of Philadelphia, and the port of Baltimore, and the port of Savannah, and other ports, to be guarded against the destruction of commerce which, in my opinion, would be sure to follow the ratification of this treaty and the fulfillment of its purposes.

I fail to find in this volume of hearings any careful study of what would happen in the way of diversion of commerce from American ports by the opening of the all-British canal. Anyone who dreams, as perhaps my friend from Michigan does, who believes in Santa Claus and fairy tales—anybody who believes that the Leviathan will ever tie up at a dock in Grand Haven, Mich., is very much mistaken. There will be no lines of service from remote parts of the world through the St. Lawrence Canal to the Great Lakes, to Detroit and Duluth and Milwaukee and Chicago. There will be occasional tramp steamers going up the river, but there will be no lines of service. How could there be?

Nobody on the face of the earth who has studied the problem can believe that there will be any west-bound freight which would justify regular lines of service. The only value that this St. Lawrence Canal could possibly have is for the transportation of wheat from the Northwest to Liverpool; and how any American wheat farmer could be deluded into the thought that he is going to benefit on that account by the development of this waterway is beyond my comprehension.

It is perfectly apparent that the wheat farmer living in Montana or the Dakotas who is benefited by this cheaper transportation must still compete with the farmer of Saskatchewan or Alberta in Canada. Whatever benefits in the way of freight rates that come to the American farmer will go likewise to the Canadian farmer. So in the race of competition in price there will be no advantage.

We know exactly what will happen as regards traffic upon this waterway, because we have a waterway there now. We have wheat taken in barges from Fort William and from Duluth down the Great Lakes, through the Welland Canal and the St. Lawrence to Montreal. Will you tell me what those barges take back? They come back empty.

Where is there an American who wishes to encourage the transportation of carload lots of goods from Europe to those western cities? Do we want plumbing supplies or stoves or furniture to be thus transported? We want our own manufacturers to make them. We are not going to look eagerly and cheerfully upon the importation through this waterway of shiploads of products which can be raised or made in the United States.

Mr. President, the Foreign Relations Committee did a very good job in determining the engineering features of this project. They have decided that it is feasible to build the canal. They have decided that power-development works can be built which will not be taken away by the ice. Some estimates have been given as to the cost of all this great undertaking. But where is there in the volume of the hearings the report of any study as to what is going to happen to our country by reason of the development of this proposed canal? That is what I want to know.

The Senator from Michigan need not complain; he can be just as quarrelsome, if it is to be a quarrel—and he suggested that word himself—in the Committee on Commerce as in the Committee on Foreign Relations, because he serves on both. He is not deprived of any of his natural-born or acquired privileges.

Mr. President, I wish every Senator would give himself the benefit of reading an editorial from the Toronto (Ontario) Mail and Empire, printed under date of July 19, 1932. When he reads this and discovers the glee with which the editor wrote the editorial because of the advantages given Canada and the check made on the efforts of Americans to guard the rights of this country, he will not longer be very enthusiastic over this treaty. It is filled with references to the advantages gained by Canada.

Of course, that is all right; I do not blame the Canadian delegates to the treaty convention.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As a matter of fact, the Canadian representatives get a good deal more trade by coming over here and helping us than they do by helping their own citizens. They have been over here with various and sundry negotiations, and in this case they are actually having us build them with American money an all-British canal to take away commerce from the United States. Our people have been trying to have the Mississippi waterway completed, but are told that the Government has not the money, even when it is solving the problem of flood control and is proposing to pay $600,000,000 to take traffic away from United States ports. Those Canadian representatives ought to stay here. They are doing their Government good.

Mr. COPELAND. They did very well while they were here, I will say for them.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to article 3, although I had not thought at all to discuss any of the parts of the treaty. I had thought merely to point out what I think is an error in attempting to refer this matter to the Committee on Foreign Relations, when it ought to go to the Committee on Commerce; but while we are about it, we might just as well say a few words about the treaty.

I call attention to article 3 of the treaty. This has to do with the international section of the river, the part where the Lachien Rapids are, and where the powerful currents of the river are capable of developing immense quantities of hydroelectric power.

This is what article 3 provides:

> The High Contracting Parties agree to establish and maintain a temporary St. Lawrence International Rapids Section Commission, hereinafter referred to as the Commission, consisting of 10 members, 5 to be appointed by each Government, and to empower it to construct the works in the international rapids section included in the project described in the final report of the Joint Board of Engineers (not included in the works provided for in articles I and II hereof, and excluding the power-house superstructures, machinery, and equipment required for the development of power) with such modifications as may be agreed upon by the Governments, out of funds—> which the United States hereby undertakes to furnish as required by the progress of the works, and subject to the following provisions.

Note this—

"Out of funds which the United States hereby undertakes to furnish." Did anyone ever hear anything like that?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I just wanted to say that there is such a thing as living on the interest of what you owe. In this instance we are asked to make a payment to Great Britain of $600,000,000 interest on what they owe us.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, are we going to vote for a treaty which specifically and solemnly provides that the development of this international section of the river shall be done wholly at our expense? That is what the treaty provides.

I am not content to have the purely domestic features of this project referred to a committee which is willing to give away the money of the United States to Canada. With that money of ours—and I am speaking by the record; I am not making this up out of my head—with that money which we supply, "insofar as is possible in respect to the works to be constructed by the Commission, the parts thereof within Canadian territory, or an equivalent proportion of the total of the works, shall be executed by Canadian engineers and Canadian labor and with Canadian material."

Mr. President, that is what the treaty provides. We supply the money, we give all the money, and since a part of the work is to be done on Canadian soil with our money, the treaty solemnly proposes that wherever the work is done on Canadian soil the work shall be prepared by Canadian engineers, with Canadian labor employed, and Canadian material used.

Mr. President, here we are, with 13,000,000 unemployed in our country. We cannot get money enough to help the poor in our country, but we would actually supply these millions of dollars to build a canal largely on Canadian territory by the use of American money and Canadian labor. That is the absurdity of it. I did not want to speak about that this morning. But Senators will see how wrong it is to proceed with a project without having given any thought as to what will happen to our country if we carry it into execution.

I wish every Senator, if he does not choose to read the report of the hearings, at least will read the treaty itself. It is not long. It is perfectly surprising how much we can give away by the use of a little language. On pages 2, 3, 4, and 5—five pages of this volume I have in my hand—appears the treaty. Any citizen of the United States can have a copy of this volume containing the report of the hearings before a subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations by writing to the Foreign Relations Committee. When our citizens come to realize what is proposed, that we are actually asked to give away the money of our country to provide a canal upon which will ride vessels carrying the British flag, when they once know that, they will rise up in protest.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I may add, with the Senator's consent, that after the United States had contributed the large sum necessary to pay for this undertaking, and it then becomes a British property, as the canal shall be used it is to be supervised and administered, during the time of its existence, by a body which, in the nature of things, under this treaty, must remain wholly British because directed by Canada. Therefore we are to be without voice, utterly without one, even in the administration of the water, and in any other place of authority where we could protect American ships carrying American grain on behalf of citizens of the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Illinois if that will not mean that, for the first time in the history of the United States, we will have the British Government passing upon rates and charges we are to pay on our own commerce, being financed with our own money?

Mr. LEWIS. I have always conceived and frequently asserted, in my opposition to this treaty when it was in process of preparation, that the power would be granted under it, and in its administration, after it is completed, for Canada, in the protection of her own, to put such charges and burdens upon the ships that come through that canal as to make it impossible for American grain to go through on water on the way to Liverpool upon an equal basis with Canadian grain, while we have been deluded upon the theory that Canada, with intelligent people, is going to sit quietly and allow American grain, through the waters of Canada, to have privileges equal with British grain to a British market. Why anyone ever conceived that Canada could be so indifferent to its own interests as to allow that, I have never understood, and equally, therefore, since it is so apparent that the Canadian regulations and the wharf privileges will make it impossible for an American to get an equality of commerce with Canada, why, under the circumstances, the United States should be at all willing to ratify such a treaty.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, and then, added to everything else, those favoring this treaty talk about a canal that is going to be useful to our country that will operate for only 6 or 7 months in a year. Day before yesterday the first ship reached Montreal this season. I myself have been over that river, have gone to Europe by way of the St. Lawrence and the Straits of Belle Isle. Even as late as early July the icebergs were so numerous that it was utterly impossible to traverse those waters with any degree of safety.

Mr. President, I would not think of taking any further time from the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who wishes to go on with the farm relief bill, but at another time I shall discuss this subject in detail. In the meantime, I hope the Committee on Commerce will be given the opportunity of studying the domestic problem involved.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being House bill 3835.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (H.R. 3835) to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I inquire what was the amendment just voted on?

Mr. SMITH. It was the amendment which I proposed providing that States and subdivisions of States should be relieved from paying the tax.

Mr. LONG. At this time we had temporarily consented to the consideration of other amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Louisiana that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina was offered by unanimous consent. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. That is the next question. I wish to be recognized on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this call 89 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to make a brief statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I want to make one more plea to the Senate to expedite by all possible means the passage of the pending bill. We all know that it is going to pass, and if it is to be of any service at all, so far as this year's crops are concerned, it ought to be passed at the earliest possible time. It seems to me, having that thought in mind, we ought to expedite the passage of the bill, and as chairman of the committee I am going to use every effort I can to have it kept continually before the Senate until we shall reach a conclusion of it.

SILVER EXPANSION OF THE CURRENCY

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am in great sympathy with the thought expressed by the Senator from South Carolina.

I would be a little more definite than he, perhaps, in what I would say about the passage of the pending bill. I am desirous of great haste in passing a good bill for the farmers. I do not think the Senator from South Carolina and myself are in disagreement over the fact that if the bill shall pass in its present form it will not help the farmer. I do not think we are going to quarrel over that. Therefore I have a double notive—one, that which the Senator from South Carolina expresses, and one which the Senator from South Carolina has not expressed. In other words, the way I look upon this bill in its present form is illustrated by the remark of an old colored minister down in my section of the country who in preaching a funeral sermon said, "I hope that this brother has gone to the place where I expect he ain't."

Mr. President, at this time there is now before the Senate the question of the expansion of the currency, advocated by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and, incidentally, by myself. I have proposed what is known as the Cross bill, which was introduced in the other House and which received very favorable consideration, and, while I may be somewhat in error, if I remember aright it was reported favorably to the House by the committee to which it was referred in that body. I am going to read the first few lines of this bill in order that the Senate may understand the difference between my amendment and the substitute offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. Before doing that, however, I wish to say that there is only this difference between the Wheeler bill and the one I will call the Long bill: Both bills propose to remonetize silver. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana we would simply go back to a law that was tried and proven to be sound and serviceable, while under my amendment we would go a little more to the side of experimentation such as has been urged by some of the authorities. I do not care whether the Senate shall vote for the Wheeler substitute—I may vote for it myself—or whether the Senate shall vote for the bill I have brought here, known in the House as the Cross bill. I think there is a great deal of merit to the argument of the Senator from Montana and of others that possibly the Wheeler substitute might be an improvement on the amendment which I have offered, but that is simply a matter for the Senate itself to decide.

The facts are, Mr. President, as they have been reported by the journals of the country—and I took the liberty to place on the desk of each Senator a copy of a magazine known as the Saturday Evening Post of the issue of April 15 containing an interesting article on this subject—the facts are that America and American commerce are at the mercy of foreign currency systems. England has gone off the gold standard in one respect, while in another respect she has not; but at least what England has done has been to depreciate the pound sterling to the point where, instead of its being maintained in the American market at $4.88, it is today quoted on the exchanges of the world at one third less than $4.88, or somewhere around $3.38 or $3.40. I have not noticed the market during the past few weeks particularly, but that is about the price at which the pound sterling is quoted on the exchanges.

Mr. President, England and France and Belgium and Spain and many other countries which I do not need to mention have so regulated their commerce that they can buy and sell from one another. England can ship shoes into Spain, and Spain can sell cowhides back to England. France can sell one thing to the Argentine and get her raw products from the Argentine; but the only kind of trade that can be normally carried on with America is what England can sell to America and France can sell to America, but America cannot sell much to France and America cannot sell much to England. I am not overstating that picture in any sense.

The fact is that the American money market has been practically regulated and manipulated by foreign powers. We have been talking about some kind of conference for the purpose of remonetizing silver; but we have been unable to get such a conference for the purpose of remonetizing silver, or, at least, to obtain any action on the part of foreign governments looking in that direction; but they have so regulated their currencies, their gold, and so recognized silver that it is traded in as a commodity of money with the countries with which they are dealing today. So successfully have they done this that the American Government sees the shoes of Great Britain, made of cowhides bought in Spain, sold in America; it sees the manufactured goods of Holland sold in America. Holland goes to other countries to get the raw materials and comes to America to sell the finished product, and unloads its manufactured or even raw commodities in this country without taking back to Holland a single thing in the way of American products for the use of the Hollanders. That is so true, Mr. President, that the only thing that England and France and Belgium and Holland have in America today is a trade balance payable in gold.

I wonder how many of us in the Senate have made any study of this matter at all? We have been waiting for our departments to report to us. About the time they get ready to report to us, some English statesman volunteer their assistance and offer to acquaint our department officials with the situation so far as it relates to America. They finally wind up over here by coming here with some kind of a bill or some kind of a recommendation, if they offer any recommendation, that fits the farmer and laboring man about as well as an ordinary sock would fit a chicken. How will this bill help anybody if we do not put currency in it?

I am not alone in that idea. The committee reporting the bill said practically that it is not going to do any good if we do not extend the currency. That is the report of the committee. Why did not the committee get down to business and do what it said ought to be done? the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] inquired the other day. Why did not the committee, recognizing that the bill would not do what is actually desired, add to the bill a proposition for expansion of currency or remonetization of silver?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will answer the Senator by saying that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry felt that it did not have jurisdiction to deal with legislation relating to the currency or currency matters.

Mr. LONG. That being true, and I can see how the committee could well have that idea, it is all the more necessary now, inasmuch as the committee did not want to do violence to the jurisdiction of another committee, that the Senate should now do what the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry said ought to be done, but which it did not think it had jurisdiction to do. There may not have been jurisdiction in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to do what it thought the circumstances required, but there is jurisdiction in the United States Senate to do what we know is required, if the legislation is going to be of any practical relief to the farmers or the American people.

We are not going to be able to sell our products abroad, but that is not all. If the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] will give me their close attention for a minute or two, I will show them that we are not accomplishing much if we pass the bill as it is now without having remonetization of silver or inflation of currency in it. We are practically wiping America out of business. It is proposed to put a process tax on cotton, on wheat, on swine, on rice, and some other things. It is proposed that if I take a hog to sell I am going to say, "This hog is selling on the market today for 7 cents a pound, but in the period we have selected as a basis that hog used to sell for 20 cents a pound. I am going to sell you the hog for 7 cents a pound and you are going to give me one of these process certificates and you are going to pay the Government 13 cents a pound and then I am going to get back the 13 cents a pound, making the hog a 20-cent hog." That is the first proposition.

But, Mr. President, we have a little effort in here to protect this by a tariff which it will not do and I will show why before I get through. We are leading the American commodities to slaughter because the English pound has been depreciated to where the American dollar deals in the market at a 50-percent disadvantage to the English pound. On that basis the more we raise our own prices and the more we are going to help foreign trade, the more possible it will be for them to sell the commodities of the British Empire and of other countries in America, because they are already at a 50-percent advantage by reason of the fact that their currency has been depreciated that much and we have held the American dollar up to its former standard. Therefore, every time we raise the price of the products of agriculture in America by a subsidy, just that much more simple and easy we make it for countries with silver remonetized and a depreciated currency to hurdle the little tariff walls we have and sell their products in the American market.

Can we go to those countries and make trade with them? No, indeed. On the contrary, the American dollar is on the same basis it was when the pound sold for $4.84. If we go to England today with our dollar held up to the standard of the $4.84 value of the British pound, we find the British pound selling for $3.38, and so we are dealing with them at a 50-percent disadvantage, because we would have to exchange our dollars for their pounds, and that means we lose 50-percent of the value in order to sell American raw or manufactured goods in England today.

Let me prove how this is actually working out. Do not take my word for it. Mr. Ford, of the Ford Motor Co., is establishing manufacturing agencies in Ireland and other European places, and today they are actually shipping Ford tractors from Europe to the United States and plowing ground with them in the State of Alabama. As a result of the currency inequality, as the result of our niggardly policy of refusing to recognize silver, they are actually taking American capital over to Europe, employing European labor, shipping manufactured articles back on British ships, and American money is having to buy them because, on account of our own currency and our own tariffs, we cannot compete with foreign countries in what they raise and in what they manufacture. That is a sad predicament for us to be in.

We have an economic conference called. "America", so said one of our famous humorists, "has never been known to lose a war or to win a conference." We have another conference called. When this conference was first called, throughout the length and breadth of this country we read newspaper reports that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the Prime Minister of England, and representatives of other countries had said that they were not going to discuss anything except the war debts, that they were not going to extend the conference to include the currency, that they were not going to extend the conference to include any such thing as trade treaties or the like. All of a sudden they have had a very great change of heart. They were not going to send their Premiers or any of their big men over here. They were going to send some of the King's ordinary houseworkers, some third- or fourth-rate politicians from England, and whatever was submitted to them would be reported back by them to the Prime Minister for his final promulgation before the King.

But for some unknown reason they have suddenly changed their minds with reference to both of those declarations. The first one was that they were not going to talk over anything but war debts, but that has been broadened now to say that they will not only discuss war debts, but will discuss trade agreements and they are going to discuss the currency matter also. They did give that out in rather a veiled way. Not only are they going to permit discussion of those questions, but now they are going to send Prime Minister MacDonald back to see us, and the former Prime Minister of France, Mr. Herriot, is coming back, as well as the leading men of other countries. All of them are coming back to pay us a patriotic visit and now they intend to paint the skies just as they did when Woodrow Wilson once went to Paris, when they declared that America was the savior of the world. We have fallen for that kind of logic again. It is almost like ringing the funeral bells to hear them say it again.

But they have never changed their methods and practices of dealing with the American people. They always come out with a great placard that the hope of civilization is America. Six months ago they were calling us "Uncle Shylock" and saying we are nothing but money lenders and pirates; but at the same time they were unloading the German marks and English pounds and everything else on us, until they have taken practically everything we had to Great Britain and France and have financed themselves to the ultimate extent, and now they tell us that we should not go off our sound basis of currency, the gold standard, because it would injure our relationships with them. They urge that we should stay on the standard where we are in order that the depreciated currencies which they have taken advantage of themselves may be enjoyed abroad—to enable them to take American commerce in foreign countries away from the American trader, and then to come to America and sell their own raw products and manufactured goods without buying a single thing back from America, in such a manner that everything they bring to America is payable in the only American basis of currency we know and that is gold. Therefore, instead of taking back the goods of America, they establish nothing whatever but credit balances in the United States payable in gold.

How far have they gone? If they sell us $100,000,000 worth of goods and do not take back goods in payment for them, then America owes to Europe $100,000,000 in gold. They have finally gone on to where, according to the public dispatches I have had opportunity to read lately, they have in one country alone established a trade balance in a few months' time of $158,000,000 payable in gold. I will not be exactly certain of those figures. I am quoting them as nearly as I can from memory.

If they go on with that process, they can pay Argentina, they can pay Spain, they can pay Russia, they may be where they can pay Italy, and possibly be able to pay all the other countries with which they deal in the kind of currency which they are all recognizing today; but they have us refusing to recognize any basis of currency whatever except gold. Therefore they can trade with Spain and swap their currency for the currency of Spain; they can trade with Argentina and Brazil and trade their silver for the silver of those countries; but when they come to America to sell us we have to pay them in gold, because that is the only basis of currency that is recognized today by the United States.

What has been the result of it? We not only cannot get any of their trade, Mr. President, but they can get ours while we cannot get theirs. We not only cannot get our own trade—because they can leap what little tariff wall we have with their depreciated currency, and undersell our own manufacturers—we not only cannot get the trade of the other countries that they deal with, but we cannot even exchange them goods for the goods that they bring here. We have been required to establish trade balances payable in gold, to the disadvantage of the American people.

A while back we read that we were not going to allow gold to be exported; but now the Treasury has raised the ban, and announced to certain banking interests that they will be allowed to export our gold. I wonder if the Senator from South Carolina read that, and what he thought. We go down to the little man in South Carolina and say to him, "If you have any gold, you turn that gold into the United States Treasury or we will put you in the penitentiary." We have passed a law by which we have said that any man who keeps any gold in his pockets, and lives in America, will have to go to the penitentiary for doing so. That is what we have said to the American citizen; but after we get his gold in the Treasury, after we have taken it out of the pockets of the American people, after we have made the little American citizen give up the only kind of commodity base of currency that we recognize as a Government, then we say, "We will allow this gold which we will not allow our own people to keep to be exported from America by the bankers of England."

It cannot be kept by the American citizens, because it is our only base of money, and therefore it is too valuable to let our own citizens keep it in their pockets; but we will allow it to be sent over to the foreign countries to maintain the American dollar in Europe in order to discharge the trade balances that have been created by the disadvantage that the American people have in the exchange of currency!

That is what is happening. I wonder if anybody doubts that. Rather I wonder if there is anybody here who does not know that. I am wondering if they do not know that the only result that can possibly come from this policy of allowing all the foreign goods to be sold here, the American manufacturing plants to be shut down, the American farmer's products to be at a disadvantage, even in his own market—I am wondering if they have not the legislative or the congressional discretion to discern that the only result that can possibly come from this kind of a policy is the continued depletion of the gold supply in America and the continued loss of American trade and the continued loss of an opportunity for America to do business even in its own markets.

Mr. President, I have no pride of authorship. I advocated the expansion of currency sponsored by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] here last year. I still advocate it. I have even more strongly advocated the remonetizing of silver as advocated by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. If I could not get that, I would also advocate depreciating the gold content of the dollar, as advocated by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. I naturally prefer to go the constitutional route of gold and silver for money. That has been the Constitution, and that has been the policy since the day of Abraham. Gold and silver have been the base of currency and of money since the day that civilization first began. Gold and silver were the base preferred by Washington, by Alexander Hamilton, by Thomas Jefferson, by Abraham Lincoln. Gold and silver were the currency base of this country for years and years up until 1873.

When President Grant signed the bill taking silver out of the category of the base for currency, he himself said he did not know the law contained any such provision as that, and if he had he would never have signed the bill. Furthermore, Mr. President, we today know that 60 percent of the people of the world recognize silver as the basis of currency and as money. Sixty percent of the people of the world have so recognized silver. People who today are selling in the American market have so recognized it.

I think, Mr. President, that either the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] or my own amendment should be adopted to this bill. The Senator from Montana is the recognized national authority on this question. I am more anxious that the Senate should hear him than myself; and in concluding I suggest the absence of a quorum, in order that the Senator from Montana may present the arguments on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I have hesitated somewhat about offering my amendment pertaining to silver to the present bill for the reason that I am as anxious as other Members of the Senate are to expedite the passage of the bill. I must confess, however, that when I say that I am anxious to see the passage of this bill, I do it with some fear and trembling as to what the result may be in the event that it is put into operation. I am so thoroughly convinced in my own mind that before agriculture can be put back on its feet something more fundamental must be done than the mere passage of a farm bill proposing by legislative enactment to raise the price of farm commodities that I reluctantly came to the conclusion that it was my duty as a Member of this body, and representing a great farming State, to offer my bill as an amendment to the farm bill.

Let me say to the Members of the Senate who suggested that that possibly should not be done, that the greatest farm organization in the United States of America, in their national convention held in the city of Omaha, went on record unconditionally for the passage of my bill, saying that it was one of the fundamental things that must be done and should be done in order to bring back the agriculture of this country.

Let me further call your attention to the fact that I am not suggesting some new and untried experiment in this country. The farm bill is admitted by the present President of the United States to be an experiment. Every piece of legislation that we have thus far passed at this session of Congress is admittedly an experiment. But I am suggesting to the Congress of the United States something that is not an experiment, something that was adopted by the fathers of this country and written into the law when they adopted the Constitution of the United States.

You men upon the other side of this Chamber who look upon Alexander Hamilton as the greatest Secretary of the Treasury of the United States will have to admit that Mr. Hamilton was one of those who wrote into the law of this country that we should have gold and silver upon a basis not of 16 to 1 but of 15½ to 1.

We had it in the law up to the year 1873, when the law was repealed. I should like to ask any Member of this body if he can tell us why silver was demonetized in 1873. I pause for an answer. Is there any man upon the floor of the Senate who can say that any agricultural group petitioned the Congress of the United States to demonetize silver? Is there anybody upon the floor of the Senate who can say that any group of bankers in the United States petitioned the Congress of the United States to demonetize silver? Is there anybody upon the floor of the Senate who can point to one single petition wherein the laboring men of this country petitioned the Congress of the United States to demonetize silver? There is not one. On the contrary, the man who introduced the bill which was afterward declared to have demonetized silver stated on the floor of the Congress that the bill would not have the effect of doing that which it was afterward contended it did. As has been well stated upon the floor of the Senate time and time again, President Grant, after he had signed the bill, stated that he did not know that that had been done.

Mr. President, I want to read a challenge which I issued when I introduced the bill which I am now offering as an amendment something over a year ago. I said then, and I say now, I assert, and challenge intelligent criticism, not mere denial, of the following statements:

First. The enactment of my bill into law would immediately thereafter nearly double the volume of the world's primary money, with the resultant increased conservative credit basis of twenty times the amount of primary money thus added to the world's stock.

Second. Within 1 year after the enactment of this bill the world's price of wheat, cotton, and all agricultural products would be more than trebled.

Third. The purchasing power of over 50 percent of the entire world's population now using silver as their sole yardstick of exchange and business transaction would contemporaneously be quadrupled; that is, the value of the silver stock would increase from 30 cents to $1.30, resulting in the creation of a market which would more than absorb all the surplus of our raw materials and manufactured products.

Within 2 years all our present agricultural land values throughout the United States would be more than quadrupled, thereby transforming the present frozen assets of the country banks in agricultural communities into liquid assets.

The unemployed-labor problem would be rapidly solved.

Contentment, happiness, and lucrative occupation would be substituted for discontent and despair, with the inevitably resulting tragedies which follow and which must follow unless something is done to relieve the present economic situation, and done very quickly.

Mr. President, I am not criticizing the administration. They were thrown unexpectedly, so to speak, into the situation in which they now find themselves, with banks failing all around them, almost in the worst chaotic condition in which this country has ever found itself. They were thrown into that condition, and, on the spur of the moment, it was necessary for them to enact legislation which was hastily conceived, and in many instances probably not well conceived. Nevertheless, every single piece of legislation that has thus far passed the Congress of the United States during the present administration has been of a deflationary character. According to Mr. Green, more men are out of employment today than were out of employment on the 4th day of March. Increasing unemployment during February and March has brought the total number of America's unemployed to above the 13,000,000 mark, President William Green of the American Federation of Labor said this week, basing his estimate on Government figures and reports from affiliated unions. According to Mr. Green's figures, about 230,000 workers lost their jobs during March, an alarming sign at this time of the year, when, he pointed out, industry generally takes on workers for the spring's busy season. The drop in jobs, he declared, means that buying power is still more reduced, deflation is greater, and that a larger number of persons are dependent upon charity.

Mr. President, let me read from an article with reference to world trade.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think his generalization is a little too broad? It occurs to me that the measure which we passed a few days ago providing for the development of forests, and so on, and calling for an appropriation of nearly $300,000,000, all of which will be expended in payment of labor—and that means consumption, of course—would relieve the situation of the charge which the Senator has made.

Mr. WHEELER. I will say to the Senator that $300,000,000 at the present time is infinitesimal in comparison with the tremendous deflation that has been carried on, by taking $500,000,000 of appropriations from the veterans at one time, cutting labor all over the country in another deflationary act. Spending $300,000,000 is so infinitesimal that it will not be felt in this country whatsoever.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. The $500,000,000 appropriation which was carried in a bill recently passed by the Senate, it does seem to me, could scarcely be denominated a deflationary measure.

Mr. WHEELER. What measure?

Mr. KING. The $500,000,000 measure, which has not yet, however, received the approval of the House. I agree with the Senator that many of the policies which were pursued by the last administration were deflationary, and I concede that deflationary activities are going on; nevertheless, I think that President Roosevelt, with a high degree of courage, and with a great deal of statesmanship, has attempted to arrest the deflationary movement, and the measure to which I have just referred, while it does not fill the gap, is a step in the right direction, and I am sure that other measures will be enacted into law prior to adjournment, which I sincerely hope will arrest the deflation which is going on.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LONG. There is no question but that our President has tried to arrest the deflationary process. The fact remains, however, that it has not been arrested. We have been going in the direction of deflation, and an increase in the number of unemployed, regardless of the President's efforts to the contrary.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I am not criticizing the President of the United States. On the contrary, let me say, so that there can be no misunderstanding about it, that I think the present President of the United States is the best man we have had as President of the United States in my memory, not excepting anyone I can think of. But it seems to me that we have now reached the time when we must take stock of the accomplishments of this administration up to the present and the probable future of legislation likely to be enacted in this session. I am sure that I am not alone in this body in feeling anxious when I contemplate the past and look forward to the future. We are not, I trust, infants here, to be beguiled with the tales of a Santa Claus. We have, I hope, reached a mental maturity that permits us to face and evaluate the realities of the situation.

No one can deny that up to date the sum total of our enacted program has resulted in a further deflation of the purchasing power of the people. I am not at this time going into the question of whether or not that deflation process was necessary to secure the stability of a market for Government securities presently to be issued. I merely state the bold and undisputed fact that so far unemployment has increased and purchasing power is diminished. Whatever changes have occurred in commodity prices, every thoughtful man realizes, are the result of temporary speculation rather than fundamental changes. But even in this field, in spite of these speculative benefits to a commodity here and there, the general level of commodity prices remains ruinously low.

The question then arises, What proposals are there in the administration program yet to be enacted which will lift us out of the depression in which we still flounder? Surely it should not be necessary to repeat that we cannot fake ourselves into prosperity by pretending to believe that it already exists. Let us make a very brief summary of the enactments to date.

There is the bank emergency law, which we were forced to enact by reason of the total collapse of the banking and financial structure of the Nation. Confessedly, that has not reached the essence of our difficulties, as thousands of banks are still closed and billions of dollars of the people's money is frozen in those institutions and therefore withdrawn from the ordinary uses of daily life in which it is so tragically needed. This is a good time to say that no banking law will ever be a success until the economic situation of the Nation is again sound, and until the farmers receive fair prices for their products and workmen are again employed at good wages. That fundamental economic truth surely must be recognized by all intelligent people.

Next there is the so-called "economy law." Without going into the merits or demerits of that measure or the necessity or lack of necessity for its passage, every intelligent person must concede that it was a deflationary measure which further reduced the purchasing power of a considerable element of our people, and, more important still, from the standpoint of general business, will withdraw from that rapid circulation so necessary to business recovery large sums of money.

The wage-reduction feature of that enactment is in direct opposition to the final results which all of us here hope to accomplish. I am sure that the President of the United States and every Member of this body realizes the fact that higher wages and a higher standard of living are absolutely essential to the satisfactory operation of the great industrial plants which we have built up in this Nation.

Next we have enacted a beer bill of some psychological effect but of no special economic importance. Outside of the temporary expenditures for the reorganization of the business incident to that enactment, the gains and losses in possible turn-over in that connection are about evenly balanced.

Next we come to the reforestation measure. When and if the 250,000 proposed to be employed thereunder are all in the service it will mean only 1 out of each 52 of the unemployed.

So much for the legislation that now stands on the statute books. Let us turn to that which will be presently enacted. There is the farm bill through which we hope to raise the price of the farmer's products. There is the farm-mortgage proposal which is designed to readjust the debt burden on the farmers of the Nation and give them a breathing spell until such time as an increased price for their products may enable them to meet their obligations. There is the proposed $2,000,000,000 bond issue to ease the burden on the city home owner. There is a suggested $2,000,000,000 bond issue for advancing employment, and a $500,000,000 relief measure which must be passed if for no other reason than to prevent the revolt of the hungry and the destitute. There is the proposed reorganization, or, more correctly, combination reorganization and bankruptcy of the railroad system. There is proposed a remodeling of the entire banking structure of the Nation.

In addition to all of these proposed legislative enactments we have an insurance situation in which thirty or more millions of Americans are creditors against the insurance companies to the extent of $103,000,000,000. And against those creditors necessarily is enforced what amounts to a moratorium on account of the inability of the insurance companies, due to the shrinkage in the value of their mortgages and securities, to meet the obligations of their contracts to the insured. We have $21,000,000,000 of interest-bearing Federal Government bonds. The amount of all indebtedness, public and private, is variously estimated at between $200,000,000,000 and $240,000,000,000. The steel business is at a low ebb; the copper business is in a state of practically complete suspension. Three million automobiles have been taken from the highways of America because their owners could no longer operate them, and month by month the wages received by the laboring people of the Nation diminish.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, what does the Senator include in the $240,000,000,000 of indebtedness?

Mr. WHEELER. I include practically all indebtedness.

Mr. HATFIELD. Is the indebtedness of counties, States, and the National Government included?

Mr. WHEELER. It is.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, this is a somber picture, but unfortunately we all know it is a true picture. Shall we who are entrusted with the welfare of our people, merely because we eat our three meals a day and live in moderate comfort, permit this situation to continue and assume the fearful responsibility which our failure to act entails?

I have in my hand, for instance, a statement coming from one of the farm organizations, a statement which was published in one of the daily newspapers, saying that in the great farm States of this country in the Middle West, in Wisconsin, the richest farm State in the whole Nation, in Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, and other rich farming States in the most fertile territory in the whole world, the farmers by May 15 are going on a strike. It is said that they are going to refuse to sell milk and other products unless the Congress of the United States shall do something to help the farmers. One of the things that they are asking for is the remonetization of silver. I say to you, Mr. President, not only does that group of farm organizations say that, but likewise the Farmers Union, which contains the largest number of farmers of any farm organization in the Middle West and the West, more than in all the other organizations put together in that territory, has in its national convention asked for the remonetization of silver. Yet someone says to me, "You should not put such an amendment upon this bill because this is a farm relief bill."

The farmers to whom I have referred are not asking for the passage of this bill. As a matter of fact, they are asking for, and would much prefer to see, the remonetization of silver than they would be to see this particular farm relief bill passed. However, Mr. President, I am going to vote for the bill, because it is apparent to me that it is the best bill we can possibly get from the Congress of the United States; but I am asking the friends of the farmers of the Nation to stand up and be counted in the effort to put on this bill an amendment which will be of real assistance to the farmers. It is not an experiment and it will do more to raise commodity prices than all the farm legislation which the Congress of the United States may pass at this session of Congress.

As a matter of fact, when this bill came up previously and it was thought that it was going to be reported out of the committee, farm prices—commodity prices went up. So whenever there has been talk of inflation of the currency in this country farm prices have immediately gone up. Why? Because of the fact that everyone knows, even the speculators of the country who deal in such commodities, that inflation will do more to raise commodity prices upon a sound basis than all the legislation we are going to pass at this session of Congress.

Giving serious consideration to everything that has been done, to everything that it is proposed to do in the program so far before Congress, I am yet convinced that the total results will fall far short of a successful solution of our problems. The farm bill will inevitably fail unless the consuming public is endowed with a greater purchasing power than it now enjoys. I want to make the prediction, which will be recalled, I hope, at a subsequent time, that with 44 nations off the gold standard and with the United States remaining on the gold standard we cannot possibly make the farm bill a success unless we have inflation of the currency.

That brings me to the question of what is the best form of inflation in order to cheapen the American dollar. Mr. President, a Senator said to me the other day, "I favor paper inflation." Let me call attention to the fact that I was in Germany in 1923 when they inflated their paper currency to the extent that the mark became practically worthless. It helped the debtor class of that country; it did wipe out the debts of the farmers and the merchants; but it did not affect world commodity prices one iota. So, when the currency of Russia, the Russian ruble, was inflated by paper currency, it did help the debtor class, but it did not help raise world commodity prices in any manner whatsoever. So, too, when France depreciated her franc by, say, 80 percent, it had no effect whatsoever upon world commodity prices. But, Mr. President, if we remonetize silver, by reason of the fact that 60 percent of the people of the world, people who are competing with us, competing with our farmers in world markets in India, China, and many other countries, it will not only help the debtor class in this country but it will raise commodity prices.

I am not a professor of economics. I presume if I had the title of "professor" my words would have much more weight in this body than is given to them as coming from just a plain, ordinary United States Senator; I presume if I were connected with the House of Morgan and came before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate my words would carry much more weight than they do as just an ordinary Senator; I presume if I had been a clerk up in the Treasury Department and had given only cursory study to this subject and I came before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate my words would carry much more weight than they do as a Senator; but I submit, Mr. President, if you will consult any economist who has the nerve and the temerity to come before a committee of the Senate of the United States—yes; if you will consult some of the economists of the Federal Reserve Board—if they will tell the truth about it they will confirm exactly what I am saying today.

It has been said that we should issue bonds to help relieve the situation. Bond issues will mean added burdens unless earnings and consequent ability to pay taxes are tremendously increased. Issue more bonds; yes; but they mean, Mr. President, more debts; and they mean that unless the world commodity price level can be increased they will be of no avail. It is not just the commodity price level in this country which needs to be raised but it is the world commodity price level, and unless an increase can be brought about in that world commodity price level, this Government is going to sink into more debt and will have to issue more interest-bearing bonds that will further depress prices and further harm the people of the United States. Deferred payments merely mean the prolongation of misery unless the ultimate method of payment is provided for in our program of reconstruction. Reorganization and consolidation of railroad units will not add to a traffic which does not exist. Moratoria against policyholders will become permanent rather than temporary unless we vitalize the value of the lands and homes upon which the mortgages of the insurance companies are based. And finally and fundamentally, the credit of the Government itself will be destroyed in attempting to carry the load of unemployment and distress unless the agriculture, industry, and commerce of this Nation can be put on a sound and prosperous basis. I believe that every Member of this body and of the other House, in his mind and heart, knows that the first fundamental requirement to a successful reorganization of the Nation's business is an increase in the basic money not only of this country but of the world.

Let me read from an article in the New York Times, written, I presume, by some professor, and, consequently, I assume that the Senate will pay some attention to it:

WORLD TRADE IN YEAR DROPS $10,000,000,000—DECLINE STEADY SINCE 1929, SAYS THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE BOARD

Foreign trade throughout the world has dropped at the rate of about $10,000,000,000 a year for the last 3 years, according to the National Industrial Conference Board, which reports on a survey covering the period of the depression.

Then it goes on:

From 1931 to 1932 the decline in the value of exports of the debtor countries was 36.5 percent, compared with a decline in imports of 33.8 percent, while the value of exports of the creditor countries declined 33.4 percent and that of imports 33.8 percent. In most of the individual debtor countries the decline in exports from 1931 to 1932 was considerably larger than the decline in imports.

This statement shows a decline in world business from approximately $52,000,000,000 to something like $20,000,000,000.

In the New York Times of yesterday, Mr. President, I read this statement written by Charles Merz:

We have a market at home which absorbed 90 percent of our total production in the prosperous years before 1930. But this did not signify our independence of world markets.

There are some Members of the Senate who say that we can live entirely within ourselves and depend upon our home market. I say it is an impossibility to do that, and at the same time to have prosperity in this country, and this statement shows why:

But this did not signify our independence of world markets. For the 90 percent was by no means evenly distributed among all industries.

And that is what we overlook, that the 90 percent is not distributed among all industries—

To many of them foreign trade was vital. In 1929 the United States exported 54 percent of the cotton it produced, 41 percent of the tobacco, 36 percent of the copper, 33 percent of the lard, 28 percent of the sewing machines, and from 21 to 40 percent of the agricultural machinery, printing machinery, locomotives, typewriters, lubricating oils and kerosene.

FOREIGN TRADE AND PROSPERITY

Inevitably the prices of these goods were established in world markets.

With depreciated currencies in 44 countries, with the currency of Japan depreciated 60 percent, with England's depreciated 30 percent, with that of the Argentine 40 percent, with depreciated currencies ranging all the way from 50 percent down to 10 percent, how do you expect, Mr. President, under those circumstances, to bring back prosperity in the United States, when England is manipulating at this very moment not only the pound sterling but is likewise manipulating the dollar? She wants to keep us upon the gold standard; she wants to keep the dollar high; and yet we sit here in the Congress of the United States and let the British Government manipulate our dollar, so that the minute it starts to go down the English start to buy the dollar so as to keep it up, because of the trade advantage they have with us when they have a depreciated pound sterling and we have a high-priced dollar.

The range of these prices determined in large measure the purchasing power of millions of Americans engaged in producing goods for export. Their purchasing power in turn affected vitally the price level of other goods produced primarily for home consumption.

Why is it? Some folks talk about a bill to bring up the price of wheat in order to get the advantage of the tariff, the price of hogs and the price of this and that so as to get the advantage of the tariff. Every product in the United States that is not artificially controlled by the Aluminum Co. of America, which controls the price of aluminum, whether protected by the tariff or not, has gone down with other commodities that have to be sold upon the world market, but those products that I have mentioned that have to be sold upon the world market—cotton and wheat and copper and other things—cannot do anything else but bring down the price of commodities that are used for home consumption.

But we are talking of raising the tariff to protect us. We can put on all the tariff we want, but we cannot bring up the price of products in this country as long as we have to do business abroad and ship 54 percent of our cotton, 33 percent of our copper, and a large percentage of our automobiles, steel, and everything else we produce in large quantities. What must we do? We must take one horn or the other of the dilemma. We must depreciate our dollar and bring it down to the price of the pound sterling or else bring up the cost of production of our competitor. I am not asking to join in a race in depreciating currency. I am saying we can bring up the cost to our competitors by remonetization of silver, and I challenge anybody here to deny the statement which I am making that the remonetization of silver as it was done under the laws of the country, not as an experiment, not by some professor who in the quiet of his room has written a bill, but under the laws of our country written by the greatest economists the world ever produced.

I am not proposing to tread some untried path, but to go back and do a fundamental thing. Yet we hear it said that we must not do it until we hear from the Treasury Department. Bless my soul, Mr. President, the Treasury Department has been wrong in every prediction it has made during the last 12 years. It is said we must wait until we hear from the representatives of the house of Morgan. They have been wrong, too. We must wait until we hear from the National City Bank, which we have followed blindly, and the Chase National Bank, which we have likewise followed blindly in outlining our economic course during the last 4 or 5 years of the Republican administration; but they have been wrong in every prediction made. We sat here supinely and jumped through the hoop when the financial masters came down here from Wall Street and appeared before the committees of Congress and told us what to do.

Is it not about time we assert our own independence and use our own intelligence, rather than follow somebody who is looking at the situation from his own selfish standpoint?

The article from which I have been quoting continues:

A thriving foreign trade was thus an indispensable factor in our prosperity before 1930, and the collapse of this trade has been ruinous for industries whose capacity is geared to foreign markets. Domestic demand for goods produced by these industries cannot easily be increased by as much as 30, 40, or 50 percent in order to offset the loss of exports. Nor can the capital and population formerly engaged in the production of these goods be shifted readily into other industries whose output could be sold at home.

For in most industries the United States is already equipped to produce goods in excess of the present capacity of its own markets, and it is difficult to find fields of production which are capable of being expanded so as to absorb capital and labor released from other fields.

Mr. President, on the same page of the same paper we have a chart showing the gold reserves in the United States. We have about $11,000,000,000 worth of gold. It is shown by the chart that seven creditor nations of the world have $9,000,000,000 of that gold and all the rest of the countries of the world have $2,000,000,000 of that gold. The seven creditor nations have $9,000,000,000 and all the debtor nations of the world have $2,000,000,000.

Let me invite particular attention to the change that has taken place in this country, as set forth in this article:

In considering world trade before the depression it is useful to note first the financial relationships of creditor and debtor countries.

Among the nations of the world there are many debtors. But there are only seven creditors—that is, only seven nations whose people owe less, on account of both the public debts of governments and the private debts of individual citizens, than they are owed in return. These seven are Great Britain, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Sweden, and the United States. It is a small and select group, which the United States joined only during the World War. In 1914—

I want to invite the careful attention of every Senator to this, because it is a very vital factor in the consideration of the question which we have under discussion:

In 1914 we were a net debtor to the extent of about $3,000,000,000. At the end of the war our position had changed to a net creditor of about $10,000,000,000.

Mr. President, I talked with an economist of one of the leading banks in the city of New York with reference to this very subject. He was against any inflation whatsoever. Finally I said, "You are going to get one or the other. You are going to get paper or bimetallism. Which do you want?" He said, "I prefer bimetallism because it is not revolutionary, and after all there is a limit to the amount of silver there is in the world." I said, "Can we maintain as an independent proposition the price of silver at any fixed unit?" He said, "There is no question about it." I said, "Why do you say that?" He said, "Because we are a creditor nation today as against being a debtor nation before the war." I said, "Do you think we would be flooded with silver?" He said, "Of course not, because of the fact that the silver-using countries cannot divest themselves of the only money they have."

What nonsense it is to talk about China's flooding us with silver, when, as a matter of fact, by reason of the war going on between Japan and China, they began to lose some of their silver and had to put an export duty on it to keep the silver from leaving the country. New Zealand did the same thing. They cannot carry on their internal and external trade unless they have primary money, and silver is their primary money. It is as necessary for them to have it to carry on their trade as it is for us to have some gold to back up our currency.

Forty-four nations of the world have gone off the gold standard. Why did they do it? Because they had to have 40 percent of gold if they remained on the gold standard in order to carry on. When they could not keep the 40 percent of gold they had either to contract their currency to an extent that would cripple their business, or they had to go off the gold standard to maintain their currency upon some basis. Japan went down and, as I said a moment ago, has depreciated her currency 60 percent, and she is flooding our markets today with her manufactured products. Can we pass a tariff bill that will stop that sort of thing? It cannot be done because of the fact that what we have to do is to stabilize the exchanges, and what I am asking to be done will do more to stabilize the exchanges than any other piece of legislation we can possibly pass.

We talk about the amount of silver in the world. Let me call attention to some figures issued by the United States Mint:

The total production of gold and silver in the world for the years 1928, 1929, 1930, and 1931 is as follows:

Total gold, 82,291,368 fine ounces; total silver, 960,313,580 fine ounces.

During the same period the western hemisphere produced of this total: Gold, 22,032,667 fine ounces, or 26.77 percent of the total world production.

Silver, 810,055,614 fine ounces, or 84.35 percent of the total world production.

The figures given for 1931 in report of mint for 1932 are marked "subject to revision," but no doubt are accurate enough for all practicable purposes.

Mr. President, I am not going to take the time and trouble to read all of these figures, but I ask that the statement may be placed in the RECORD so that anyone interested may read the figures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the Senator to give the present value of the total amount of silver in the world.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; 19 billion. That is the total value of all the known production for the last 100 years.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that ounces?

Mr. WHEELER. No; that is dollars.

Mr. BLACK. What would be the value of all the silver on the increased basis of valuation that would result from passage of the Senator's bill? Has the Senator the increased valuation that would result from the passage of his bill?

Mr. WHEELER. This, according to my understanding, is the increased value as it would be under my bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The estimate by the Director of the Mint and other experts is that the total amount of silver in the world today is between 11 billion and 12 billion ounces.

Mr. WHEELER. That is monetary silver?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; that is all the silver in the world. The depletion is very much greater; but today those 12 billion ounces at 30 cents an ounce would have less than $4,000,000,000 purchasing power in the gold-standard countries. At $1.29 an ounce, the rate at which we maintain parity in the United States today, the rate at which we maintain $800,000,000 of silver currency today, it would have over $15,000,000,000 purchasing power in the gold-standard countries of the world.

Mr. WHEELER. The figure I gave is the total known production since the discovery of America down to the present time.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to enable me to ask the Senator from Nevada a question?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLACK. Under the Senator's bill, which would provide for a ratio of 16 to 1, what would be the present value of that silver?

Mr. PITTMAN. May I answer that question?

Mr. WHEELER. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. The value of that silver would be $15,000,000,000 instead of $4,000,000,000 if the price that would be established on the coinage basis were maintained throughout the world.

May I express that a little further in another way?

Today we exchange 10 silver dollars for a $10 gold piece. There are 7.8 ounces of silver in that silver dollar; and yet those 7.8 ounces in the United States exchange for $10, which means $1.29 an ounce at which the Government sells the standard silver dollar in gold. One dollar and twenty-nine cents an ounce is on a ratio of 16 to 1, because gold is $20.67 an ounce; so we maintain silver in this country at a ratio of 16 to 1, which is $1.29 an ounce under our law. If Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, and Japan would do exactly the same thing that we are doing here, we would have silver at $1.29 an ounce throughout the world, with a parity of 16 to 1, and the 12,000,000,000 ounces of silver in the world would have a purchasing power in every country in the world, including our own, of $15,000,000,000 instead of $4,000,000,000 today.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator further what the Senator from Nevada has said—that all our silver money today is on the basis of $1.2929. All I am asking is that we open up the mints and continue the free and unlimited coinage of silver on exactly the same basis at which every silver dollar we have today is coined. Let me say to the Senator from Alabama that I called attention to the fact that since the war we have been a creditor nation, and by reason of the fact that we are a creditor nation there is not any question at all but that we could maintain the ratio even upon an unlimited basis. We would create an unlimited demand if we opened up the mints to the free coinage of silver, just as we have to the free coinage of gold upon the ratio of 16 to 1. It seems to me that there cannot be any question about it.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] said upon the floor of the Senate, "Why, if we coin silver we will get all the silver. This country will be flooded with silver." He said, "There are 250,000,000 ounces of surplus silver in the world." Well, suppose that were true, and suppose we got the 250,000,000 ounces that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania says we could get—what would we get it for? We would get it in return for manufactured goods or products produced in this country, that would put men to work in our factories; and if we got it for anything else it would be a mere bagatelle. If we should get only 250,000,000 ounces of silver it would not inflate our currency very much. As a matter of fact, it would not go far enough; and Mr. Brownell, who is probably one of the greatest experts upon the silver question in the world, has said in his testimony before the House committee, as I recall, that over a period of 5 years the most we could possibly expect to get or hope to get would be, as I recall, about 650,000,000 ounces.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. The testimony of Mr. Brownell before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of the House was that a doubling of the price of silver could not possibly bring into the market in excess of 350,000,000 ounces as a maximum, but that he did not believe it would bring that, because other countries would start to purchasing it at the same time.

Mr. WHEELER. As I recall, he said over a period of 5 years the very limit that we could get would be 650,000,000 ounces.

Mr. PITTMAN. He did, in 5 years.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. But that anticipated a very much higher rise of price, an unlimited rise of price during the period of 5 years.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; exactly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Fifty cents an ounce, he said, could not possibly bring over 350,000,000 ounces into the market.

May I interject just there another matter? It will save my making a speech on the subject, which I know will be pleasing to the Senate.

If the 250,000,000 ounces of silver came into this country, whether it came in under a bill such as the Senator has or whether it came in under any one of the numerous bills that have been introduced in both branches of Congress providing for the purchase of $250,000,000 worth, we would still have only this: We would have 250,000,000 ounces of silver against which we would issue $250,000,000 of silver certificates. Today we have in the United States approximately $490,000,000 of silver certificates in circulation, which have been in circulation for 40 or 50 years. We would add to that circulation $250,000,000, making it, in rough numbers, $750,000,000 in silver certificates. We would have $300,000,000 in subsidiary coin; and yet the proportion of silver currency to the proportion of total currency and the proportion of gold currency would be a third less, even with that added to it, than it was in 1900.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana further yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand, however, the Senator's bill would increase the value of silver from about 30 cents an ounce to $1.29 an ounce.

Mr. WHEELER. That is correct.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator what is the proportion of silver which we have in this country to the total amount there is in the world?

Mr. WHEELER. I cannot give it to the Senator offhand. Perhaps the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] will.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield. I think I can give it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. Go ahead.

Mr. PITTMAN. The total amount of silver in the world, as before stated, taking the world's production and the depletion as it may be estimated, is estimated at between eleven and twelve billion ounces.

It is recognized that at least 7 billion ounces has been in India for ages in the form of jewelry that the women wear, and always will keep. When silver went to $1.38 an ounce in 1920, instead of its drawing silver out of India, India bought more silver than she bought annually before. That silver is there.

China has two or three billion ounces of the same kind of silver that never came out when silver went to $1.38 an ounce in 1919. China bought more of it at that time.

The Senator asks the direct question, What is the proportion of silver we have in the United States to the total silver in the world?

In the first place, we have more silver currency circulating in the United States than in any other country in the world—not bullion, like the jewelry in India, but currency. We have today $850,000,000 of silver currency actually circulating in this country. We have approximately $4,400,000,000 of gold currency circulating. So it can be seen that approximately 20 percent of our circulating currency in this country is silver currency; so it is $850,000,000 as compared to 12,000,000,000 ounces of silver in the world.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to go back now and call attention again to the world trade. This gentleman, Charles Merz, in the New York Times—a well-recognized economist, probably a doctor—makes this statement:

> Under the influence of these forces world trade has fallen drastically since 1929. The following figures, showing the combined value of exports and of imports, tell the story.

He states that in 1929 the combined value of exports and imports was $68,000,000,000. In 1930 it dropped to $55,000,000,000; in 1931 to $40,000,000,000; and in 1932 it dropped to $26,000,000,000—world trade and commerce.

What is it that we need today? We need today in the world, as we never needed it before in the history of the world, more primary money with which to carry on trade and commerce. While the supply of gold has increased, it has not begun to keep pace with the expansion of trade and population of the world. It has not begun to keep pace with it; and yet I want to call attention likewise to this article in the Saturday Evening Post, written by Garet Garrett, in which he shows how completely Great Britain and the other countries of the world are controlling our money here, and are driving down prices in this country and throughout the world, for their own selfish advantage:

> For more than a year this country has been the object of a world-wide economic drive, producing or tending to produce the following effects, namely:
> To intensify and prolong the American phase of universal depression—

This is the leading article in the Saturday Evening Post, of which you all have a copy—

> To increase unemployment here and to arrest it in foreign countries;
>
> To defeat the American Government in its undertaking, by use of public credit, to stop the disastrous liquidation of prices, commodities, and capital values;
> To annul our tariff laws and at the same time to override the laws whereby we meant further to protect American labor by limiting immigration from countries having a low standard of living; to stimulate unnaturally the sale of foreign merchandise in the American market and at the same time to hinder the sale of American merchandise in foreign markets;
> To unbalance the economic position of this country by bringing the weight of more than half the world's selling to bear upon it, while at the same time diverting from it the support of more than half the world's buying;
> To create in this country hoards of gold, impounded to the credit of foreign countries, the first effect of which was the same as if Americans themselves were hoarding the gold, as they have been exhorted not to do, and the second effect of which might be much worse, because the foreigner owners, having hoarded it here and earmarked it, could take it out of the country whenever it pleased them to do so;
> And, lastly, to propagate in this country a motive for war-debt cancelation as the price of economic peace.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me finish this statement before I yield.

Is it possible that the Congress of the United States, that the Senate of the United States, are so weak and so supine that they are going to stand idly by and say that we are going to let these other countries regulate our currency and depreciate our prices, flood us with their goods, and prevent us from exporting our products, and we have not the courage or the nerve to stand up and pass what the majority of this body knows is the sound and the sensible thing for us to do?

Somebody said, when I introduced this amendment on the bank bill, "You must not put it on the bank bill." Somebody said, "You must not put it upon this agricultural bill." Another one said to me, "You ought to get an expert from the Treasury Department." Another one said, "You ought to get some of these financiers down here." Another one said, "You ought to get some economists here."

As far as I am concerned, Mr. President, we have had a lot of these economists, as I said a moment ago, we have had a lot of these bank presidents, and we have had a lot of these financiers, dominating our Treasury Department, our financial policy, our fiscal policy, for the last 10 or 12 years; and are we going to continue to do so?

This writer points out further in this article how there is a determined effort upon the part of these countries——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I simply want to observe to the Senate that we have the same weapon that they have, but we have not used it.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Our Federal Reserve Board could buy pounds and sell dollars, as they have bought dollars and sold pounds. Not having used that weapon, either through ignorance or through deliberate intent, it may be necessary for Congress to take some action in self-defense of our general economic structure. If it is through ignorance that the Federal Reserve Board has failed to act, they ought to resign. If it is not through ignorance but through deliberate intent, they ought to be impeached.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. While the Senator is commenting on the article of Garet Garrett in the Saturday Evening Post I am wondering if he will not read the illustration that Mr. Garrett gives in that article about the Englishman who is manufacturing shoes and selling them in the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. I want to say to the Senator—I have the article here—that I called attention to that very thing in the speech that I made here on January 25. I took a supposititious case in my speech at that time of a man manufacturing shoes in this country and assumed that Canada had a currency which was depreciated 50 percent and was manufacturing shoes.

The American buyer of shoes could take the American dollar and go to Canada, assuming that their currency was depreciated 50 percent, and could buy two pair of shoes for what he could buy one pair for in this country. Likewise the man who should go to Canada who might want to buy American shoes would have to pay twice what he would have to pay for them in the United States.

Mr. Garet Garrett points this out:

Let the case be that of a British manufacturer of shoes. He makes a pair of shoes to sell in Great Britain for £1 sterling. When the gold value of the pound sterling was $4.86 it made no difference whether he sold that pair of shoes in London for a pound sterling or in New York for $4.86. But since depreciation, the gold value of the pound sterling having fallen one third, there is a difference. If he sells that pair of shoes in London he will receive only £1 sterling, but if he can sell it in New York for $4.86 he will receive the equivalent of £1½ sterling. That is to say, formerly if he brought home his $4.86 from New York he could exchange it for simply £1 sterling, whereas now when he brings home the $4.86 received for the shoes in New York he can exchange it for £1 10s.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not stop reading there. See what he does.

Mr. LONG. Go on with the next paragraph.

Mr. WHEELER. It continues:

Then let this British shoe manufacturer be in need of leather. Will he buy it in the United States? Obviously not, because he would have to change his pounds back into dollars at a discount of one third to pay for American leather. Instead, he will seek his leather in some depreciated-currency country where the buying power of the British pound sterling is unimpaired—leather, that is to say, somewhere in Sterlingaria.

So, when the British Treasury, with a fund of more than three quarters of a billion dollars officially devoted to the manipulation of international exchange, sold the pound sterling to cheapen it and bought the American dollar to make it dear, it had these definite objects in view:

First, to penalize the purchase of American goods; for who can afford to change pounds sterling into dollars at a discount of one third to pay for American goods?

Second, to subsidize the sale of British goods in the American market, by giving the British exporter an artificial profit of approximately 50 per cent in the exchange, which enables him to land his goods over the American tariff wall at prices which are less than the cost of manufacturing similar goods in this country. Thus our tariff laws are annulled.

Third, to create large gold balances in this country.

Their gold balances have been going up since they have gone off the gold standard, because of the export of their products to the United States. Mr. Garrett continues:

These balances represent credits for British goods sold in the American market.

Mr. President, what the author says with reference to British goods is likewise true with reference to manufactures in China, in India, and in Japan. As I said a moment ago, according to Mr. Merz in the New York Times, the currency of Japan has been depreciated, not 30 percent, as the English pound has been depreciated, but it has depreciated 60 percent.

What has happened over in China, with the value of their money down really to one fifth of the value of the dollar? They are buying some more cotton in the United States, but what are they doing to our manufactures? They are buying because of the cheap price of cotton in this country, and they are taking our raw cotton and our raw tobacco to China and are manufacturing it in their own factories. Not only that, but to the men from the cotton States let me say that the low price of silver has stimulated as has nothing else the production of cotton in China and in India. If the men from the cotton States and those from the tobacco States really want to do something to help the tobacco growers and the cotton producers of this country, they can do it by remonetizing silver more than by all the farm relief bills they could pass at this session.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Right on that point, I think it is interesting to compare our exports to China for the years 1928, 1929, and 1931. We find that our exports of crude materials to China in 1928 were 30.5 percent of our total exports to that country. In 1931 they were 49 percent. The exports of crude materials to China had increased from 30 percent to 49 percent.

Let us follow that down and see what happened to the manufactures. In 1928, 47 percent of our manufactured exports were to China; in 1931 they amounted to 26.4 percent. In other words, our exports of raw materials, which are cotton and tobacco chiefly, have maintained a level and have actually increased, while our exports of manufactured materials from the United States in those 4 years have decreased 75 percent.

Our cotton men think that they are not hurt, but if we turn to another table furnished by our Department of Commerce we will find that the export of manufactured cotton-textile goods from Great Britain to China fell off in the same period 75 percent, and we will find that our cotton exports to Great Britain during the same time fell off 75 percent. So, while we held our own with China, since China is industrialized because she has increased her textile mills 25 percent in 3 years, our great cotton business with Great Britain has been destroyed by reason of the destruction of her textile mills.

I want to call attention to the report of the British Economic Mission to China, sent there in 1930, with which they had a great corps of experts, and they spent £80,000 on the examination. We find in that report that this loss in the export of manufactured products to China is due to the depreciation in the value of silver, thereby making the exchange value of silver money so low in comparison with gold-standard money that those people were unable to buy gold exchange in Great Britain with which to pay for products, and the industrialization of China had commenced. They said that unless they raised the exchange value of silver money in comparison with gold-standard money—and that could only be done by restoring the purchasing price of silver—the industrialization of China would go on to the point where not only would Great Britain have no market for manufactured material in China but that that industrialization would threaten the world with exports of manufactured materials.

Mr. WHEELER. Not only is what the Senator has said with reference to the industrialization of China and with reference to the industrialization of India true, but since Japan has depreciated its currency 60 per cent they are having the greatest period of prosperity they have had in years, because of the fact that they are able to conquer the markets of the world.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator this question: In view of the fact that the Secretary of State has already publicly announced that the question of silver as money will be taken up at the coming International Economic Conference, does he think it is wise to press this matter at this time? The United States, of course, cannot alone fix the international value of silver, and does not the Senator think it would be the part of wisdom for us to defer action and let the International Economic Conference take this matter up and work out some system so that silver, if it is remonetized, will be worth the same all over the world instead of fixing its value in the United States alone?

Mr. WHEELER. I want to say to the Senator, in the first place, that I do not agree with his premise at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is my premise?

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator said we would have to have an international conference.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I said in view of the fact that we would have one.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator said, in view of the fact that we cannot do it alone.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator does not answer my question.

Mr. WHEELER. I will answer the Senator's question, but I first want to show him that he is wrong.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not want the Senator to go off on a sidetrack. I asked him whether, in view of the fact that our own Secretary of State has publicly announced that he proposed to submit to the International Economic Conference the question of silver, he did not think it well that the United States wait and let him do that, instead of undertaking to settle the question alone?

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator will let me answer his question, after he has stated it to me twice—I understood it the first time——

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon. He did not seem to understand it.

Mr. WHEELER. I understood it, because I understood the Senator to ask his question "in view of the fact" that we could not fix the price of silver alone. I say, in the first place, that I disagree with the Senator's statement, and I say that because of the fact that we are a creditor nation, and I say to the Senator that if he will consult some of the economists of this country who have given some thought and study to this matter, he will find that that assumption on his part is entirely incorrect.

Let me say to the Senator, further, in view of what we know of the position of England, and the reason why she is juggling at the present time the currency of the United States of America, that I have not the slightest faith that England is going to agree at the economic conference, and nobody else has any belief that they will agree, to a proposition to remonetize silver. Why should they? They have an advantage, as I called to the attention of the Senator just a moment ago from this article by Garet Garrett. They have an advantage over the United States. They want to keep us on the gold standard. It is to their interest to keep us on the gold standard. Every time the price of our money drops they go in through this fund they have created and buy American dollars. Let me read the statement to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is not necessary; I have read the article entirely.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator read the statement and if he has studied the question, then, under the circumstances, it is inconceivable that he could believe for one second that out of that economic conference will come anything worth while. Ever since 1873 we have been calling these economic conferences, and I agree entirely with Will Rogers when he says that we never lost a war and that we never won a conference; and we are not going to win this one.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, is the Senator against the conference? Does he not want us to confer with the other nations with reference to all these economic questions?

Mr. WHEELER. I am not against it, but I have no faith that anything at all will come out of it. Nothing ever has come out of one of them, as far as benefit to the United States is concerned, and I make this prediction, and the Senator will, I am sure, after the conference is over agree with me, that nothing will be done at that conference worth while with reference to regulating international exchange and money.

There is one thing in which England is interested, and that is in cutting down the debt she owes to the United States of America. That is the one thing she is going into that conference for; that is the one thing she is going into any conference for. She has a double purpose. First of all, she is not going to permit commodity prices in the world to come up. She is not going to permit us, if she can help it, to cheapen the American dollar, unless we first agree that we will cut the debts of Great Britain and the other countries.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that it does not seem to me that he is rendering his country a very great service, when he knows that it is going into this economic conference and it is going to submit these matters, when he bitterly denounces one of the most powerful countries that will be at the conference and predicts that nothing will come of the conference, when the United States is one of the chief actors in the conference.

So far as wanting to pay the war debt is concerned, it seems to me that if we remonetize silver, as the Senator wants us to do, at 16 to 1, England could pay her war debts at about 25 cents on the dollar by sending her silver from India and other countries over here and paying them at the rate of 24 cents an ounce, when the Senator would make it worth $1.29 an ounce. Let me say to the Senator——

Mr. WHEELER. Let me answer the Senator's statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has the floor. Does he yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say, in the first place, that the Senator again is wrong. How, in the name of goodness, is Great Britain going to buy silver at 24 cents if there is an unlimited demand for it at $1.29? She would have to pay the same price as we would. So far as rendering service to the country is concerned, I say that when I am asking for the remonetization of silver I am asking for it from a patriotic standpoint. I am not interested in China; I am not interested in India; I am not interested in England; but, first of all, I am interested in the United States of America, and I am interested, Mr. President, because of what Great Britain and other countries have done. We, including myself and the Senator from Texas, have been sitting here idly by and have been jumping through the hoop at the dictation of a little group of Wall Street bankers who have dominated the finances of this country. I say to the Senator——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WHEELER. Just a moment and I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. At that point I should like to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator does not want to yield at that point, there is no use of my interrupting him.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that when he says I am not rendering a public service to my country, I resent the statement, because the fact is——

Mr. CONNALLY. I did not say that.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, the Senator did; and I resent the statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. I rise to a question of privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think the Senator has any right to refer to another Senator in that way. Will the Senator from Montana now yield?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say that I have not attacked the Senator's patriotism. I merely said I thought he was not rendering his country a very good service——

Mr. WHEELER. If that is not attacking my patriotism, I do not know what it is.

Mr. CONNALLY. I feel that a man may do something entirely innocently, and I think the Senator is innocent. I would not say innocently ignorant, because I do not think that would apply to the Senator [laughter in the galleries], but let me say just one other thing——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will admonish the occupants of the galleries that they are here as guests of the Senate. Demonstrations of approval or disapproval of remarks made on the floor of the Senate are strictly forbidden by the rules of the Senate. The Chair hopes the occupants of the galleries will adhere to the rule.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator that I am entirely in sympathy with the idea of reducing the value of the American dollar, but I have a different view as to how it should be done than that which the Senator entertains. I favor reducing its gold content.

Let me say one other thing to the Senator, after apologizing for what he imagines is some attack on his patriotism, which, of course, is visionary and purely a phantom; he says that we have all, including himself, been jumping through the hoop of Wall Street. He may have been jumping through the hoop at the command of Wall Street, but I want to say that, so far as the Senator from Texas is concerned, I have not jumped through the hoop for Wall Street at any time and do not expect to do so; nor have I jumped through the hoop for Great Britain, either.

Mr. WHEELER. When I said that with reference to the Senator I meant it in the general sense that, as I think everybody will concede, the economic policies adopted by the Government of the United States during the last few years have been dictated and absolutely dominated by a little handful of people in the city of New York; and when I said that the Senator had been a party to it, too, I meant the Congress of the United States, and he is a Member of the Congress.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; the Senator mentioned the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator is offended by reason of that statement, I retract it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not; the Senator cannot offend me.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think that the Senator, in his generalization as to the effect of international conferences, went a little farther perhaps than accuracy would justify. My recollection is that there has been no economic conference for the consideration of the silver question.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes; there has been.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment further, and will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that after the defeat of Mr. Byran, in 1896, two measures were passed by Congress providing for international conferences. Mr. McKinley named a number of gentlemen to go to Europe to participate in a silver conference, among them a Republican, a distinguished Senator from Colorado. That Senator upon his return reported that the administration had in effect undermined him and his colleagues and that the conference had been rendered abortive. He was indignant at the treatment which had been accorded the American delegation by the administration.

My recollection is that since the defeat of Mr. Bryan there has been no silver conference or one for the purpose of bringing about the remonetization of silver. The Senator will remember that the Democratic Party declared in its platform in favor of the President calling an international conference for the purpose of rehabilitating silver; that is doubtless what the Senator from Texas had in mind; but we all know that President Roosevelt has taken great interest in the forthcoming Economic Conference, and that he conferred with two delegates who were sent to the preliminary meeting called for the purpose of formulating an agenda, comprehensive in character, that would, among other things, consider the question of remonetizing silver. That agenda has been prepared, and the President and the Secretary of the Treasury are now earnestly and sincerely engaged in conferences and activities preliminary to the London Economic Conference. Whether that was wise or unwise, I do not now make any comment, but I wanted the RECORD to show that the Democratic Party declared in favor of an international conference for the rehabilitation of silver.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WHEELER. Just a moment. I still say to the Senator that I have no doubt that the President of the United States is going to call the economic conference in good faith; and I still say that in view of the attitude of Great Britain, in my humble judgment, there is no more chance of getting anything worth while done for silver than there is of my flying to heaven at this very moment; and I do not expect to do that.

Mr. KING. Neither do I.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, England did not call any conference when she established her basis of currency.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course not.

Mr. LONG. Other nations have gone ahead and established advantageous systems. I hope the conference will do some good, but whether it shall do good or not there is no reason why we should not do our own people what good we can with or without a conference. I am not opposing a conference; I would be the last one to do that.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, England never consulted us when she went off the gold standard, when she depreciated her currency; Japan never consulted us; Germany never consulted us; France never consulted us; but it seems to me in this country we feel that before we can take any steps at all with reference to our economic policy the first thing that we must do is to consult Great Britain, that we must consult France, or we must consult some other country. For my part, I say that I am not in accord with simply submitting everything to Great Britain to see whether or not it is satisfactory to her before we go ahead and adopt our own course, when we have the power to do so.

Here is the statement by Mr. Garet Garrett, and in the correctness of his statement I have great faith. He says:

> To begin with, take the news of how international exchange has been manipulated from London in behalf of Sterlingaria. This is from the London Economist, January 7, last, the article entitled "Money in 1932", beginning on page 7:
> "Meanwhile, steps had been taken under the 1932 Finance Act to institute special machinery for the regulation of the exchanges. * * * This machinery consisted of the establishment of a special exchange equalization account, owned and operated by the Government, and empowered to hold assets in the form of gold, devises, or sterling, as seemed desirable. The funds at its disposal amount to £150,000,000, plus the balance of the old dollar-exchange account, and when it came into being on July 1 the floating debt was increased by £150,000,000, mainly in the form of Treasury bills, to provide it with the necessary resources."
> Who but a banker or one trained in exchange would know the simple meaning of that?
> Then this, from the Financial Chronicle in New York, February 11, as viewing some of the effects:
> "Sterling exchange, as during the past few weeks, continues exceptionally firm and is prevented from soaring to extremely high figures, it is thought, only by the intervention of the London authorities working in the various foreign-exchange centers through the exchange equalization fund. * * * The market has no way of gaging exactly the operations of the exchange equalization fund, as no official information is ever given out. Nor are the earmarkings of gold in New York officially explained. However, well-informed bankers and foreign-exchange authorities are convinced that most of the gold earmarked in New York during the past few weeks has been for the account of the Bank of England acting for the exchange equalization fund, which has been selling sterling and buying dollars, and converting the dollars into actual metal from day to day."

Yet we talk about expecting to get something from an international conference with Great Britain when she has been manipulating the dollar to keep it at a high price.

Somebody said to me when I was talking the last time, "What you are trying to do is to help China and to help India raise the price of silver. You are trying to help China and India." Just stop for a moment, Mr. President, and think of that. England is depreciating her currency because it is helping her to do so; it is helping her unemployment situation; it is helping her in her trade; it is helping her to sell her goods and send them to America. Japan is doing the same thing; the Argentine Republic is doing the same thing. What I am trying to do, Mr. President, is to raise the value of our money so that it will make it impossible for them to dump their goods upon the American market and make it possible for them to buy from us rather than to sell to us.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think that if we could first remonetize silver as proposed by his amendment there would be a much greater probability the conference would result in some good to America than it is apt to do if we go into an international conference and ask other nations if we may be permitted to do this?

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, I do not think there can be any question about that at all. In my judgment, the best service we could render the President of the United States in the forthcoming conference, the best thing we could possibly do for the Government of the United States, would be to have the Senate at this time adopt this amendment. It would serve notice upon Great Britain and upon the other countries of the world that unless they are going to come along with us and take some action on this question, the United States of America itself intends to do something.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The situation in China as I found it in 1931 was peculiar. The National Government of China was very anxious to restore the purchasing power of silver because it could not pay its foreign debt without restoring the price of silver. In other words, they collected $4 on the hundred in taxes in silver dollar; and when they applied that to their $500,000,000 foreign-debt service, each dollar was worth only 25 cents. Therefore, they had to go into default; and when they defaulted, they had no credit with which to buy munitions, rails, road machinery, engines, and cars; they could not carry out their promise. It was impossible for a government to be maintained in China on that exchange ratio. But the people of China, the merchants of China, had exactly the opposite view. They realized that it was injurious to Great Britain, a gold-standard country, and injurious to the United States, but it was profitable to them, because so high an exchange rate acted as a tariff barrier—that is, the people got no more dollars for their rice and their labor than they ever did—but they had to pay 4½ to 1 to buy our gold-standard dollar with which to purchase our products. They deliberately said, "It has injured the United States and Great Britain and other gold-standard countries, but this depreciated currency of ours as measured by the gold standard is bringing about a boom in China," and that is the fact; there was a boom in China. However, under this condition, they can never have a national government in China that will last. They will never have permanent development in China under this condition. That is the situation.

We are not by any legislation that restores the price of silver directly and immediately benefiting the Chinese people, but permanently we are benefiting them, and we are removing a barrier to trade that is industrializing China; we are removing it just as we would as if it were possible for us to compel Great Britain to go back to the gold standard, which we cannot do. The currency situation in regard to silver money is exactly the same as with regard to the gold-standard money of the countries that have gone off the gold standard. There is absolutely no distinction.

There seems to be a belief in the minds of the British people and of the French that we are interested solely in the commodity price of silver by reason of producing silver in the United States. The silver we produced in the United States last year was only 24,000,000 ounces. At the market price it was a little over $6,000,000 gross. It was not one fifth the value of the product of any one of the mining States. The whole world production of silver was only 160,000,000 ounces, and that was not worth over $40,000,000 gross. So their thought is absurd.

The British are far more interested in restoring the price of silver than is the United States. That applies to the British merchants and exporters. They had a larger trade in manufactured articles with China than we ever had. Not only that, but India has had a deathblow, as was stated in a speech of the president of the Bank of Issue of India, in which he called attention to the fact that the purchasing power of the people of India has been cut in half and that if they could restore their purchasing power it would be one step alone toward restoration of trade in the world.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the Senator. There is a certain group in England that would be very glad to see a remonetization of silver because of the fact that it would increase the purchasing power of India. But there is another group in England bitterly opposed to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator's last statement is accurate. If he will permit me, I would say that more than 200 or 300 of the leading industrialists and some of the leading bankers and some 30 or 40 members of the House of Lords and the House of Parliament formed a silver association and have been advocating for more than a year the restoration of silver to the status of primary money. Many textile manufacturers have joined the association. I think, if a vote were taken in Great Britain today, there would be a majority in favor of the remonetization of silver. There is opposition by some bankers, but many of them have come over to the bimetallic standard. The contest is between a limited number of bankers and the mass of the industrialists and the people. To repeat, I believe a vote in Great Britain today would be in favor of remonetization of silver.

Mr. WHEELER. There is no doubt that if the people had a chance to vote on it, they would remonetize silver in England. If the people of this country had a vote on it, they would vote overwhelmingly for the remonetization of silver here. Someone said Mr. Bryan was defeated on that issue in 1896. He lost by something under 500,000. Mr. John W. Davis lost by 6,000,000 or 7,000,000. Mr. Cox lost by several million votes. Yet we do not want to repudiate everything they stood for in the Democratic platform of 1924 or 1920 merely because they were overwhelmingly defeated in those elections. Conditions have completely changed. At that time we were a debtor Nation while today we are a creditor Nation. That is why I assert without fear of contradiction, because of the fact that we are a creditor Nation, that we can maintain the ratio at any fixed, definite figure we want to adopt. Any economist of any note who has given study to the subject will agree with me upon that point.

Mr. President, I do not want to take more of the time of the Senate with reference to the subject. I should be very glad indeed if we were able to take a vote on it at any moment, because I feel convinced, as I said a moment ago, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] so well expressed it, that a vote to adopt my amendment to the bill would be rendering the President of the United States the greatest possible help in the forthcoming economic conference. The President would then be able to go to the conference and say that the people of the United States are favorable to doing something with reference to the subject and that we have to insist upon doing it. If the Senate votes down this amendment, he is placed in the rather embarrassing position of having others say that the Congress is not in favor of doing anything.

We all know that the President of the United States, in his speech in my home city of Butte, Mont., declared emphatically that he was for rehabilitating silver. We know that since that time he has uttered statements to the effect that he wanted to do something about it. Let us show him that the Senate of the United States is going to back him up in that statement. As the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has well said, the Secretary of State has said it is going to be a part of the agenda of the conference. A vote to attach it as an amendment to the pending bill would back him up and give him the power to say that the United States Senate is back of him in his effort to rehabilitate silver. Those who say that a vote at this time in favor of it would disturb the situation, it seems to me, entirely miss the point.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I want to occupy the attention of the Senate briefly. It is not singular at all that in the discussion of the farm bill we should come directly to a discussion of the subject of inflation. As I take it, the silver proposition is a subdivision at least of the general subject of inflation. There is in my opinion no divorcing the subject of farm relief and inflation. They inevitably come together. Logically they are one and the same proposition. The great object of farm-relief legislation is to raise the price of commodities. Without that, any scheme which we may propose will ultimately fail. In my opinion we shall not succeed in raising the price of commodities permanently except through some system of inflation.

When we speak of inflation, the reply is that it means trouble, disaster, and greater distress. To my mind the answer to that is that unless we can arrest the fall of prices, the distress which is ahead is infinitely worse than anything we have experienced in the past. Our whole scheme for rebuilding the industries of the United States and rehabilitating agriculture rests upon the proposition of successfully arresting the fall of commodity prices and bringing about an increase in them. I ask in all sincerity, how are we going to do that except through a well-thought-out, controlled system of inflation? Has anyone suggested at any time during this period of depression any effective means of raising the prices of commodities other than through the currency or the money question?

Mr. President, it is about 4 years now since we were considering some of the first proposals made by the then President of the United States. One of the proposals which came in early was what is known as the "Farm Marketing Act." A review of the press and the general expressions of opinion at that time relative to that measure would disclose that they were to the effect that it gave reasonable assurance of maintaining farm prices and rehabilitating agriculture. For a time the effect of the measure seemed to be satisfactory. But prices continued to fall. The deflation continued on its course. The Farm Marketing Act proved to be wholly inadequate for the purpose for which it was enacted. It was built on a false foundation. The essential cornerstone of rebuilding was absent. We were endeavoring to bring prosperity to farmers without providing against the fall of prices.

From time to time measures were proposed and some of them passed, all having for their purpose the rebuilding of American industries and, as was said at the time, of restoring confidence in the American people. We came to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure. We recall well how it was prophesied that this would restore business, inspire confidence, and start the American people on the way to reasonable prosperity. It is interesting to go back and read the prophecies concerning those measures and what was expected of them and how it was hoped that they would have some tendency at least to stay the price of commodities and restore confidence in the American people. Prices continued to fall. Loans instead of being a blessing came nearer being a curse. The effect of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure was wholly disappointing. Nothing which was proposed had the effect of staying the fall of commodity prices. Therefore every measure and every proposal proved a failure. We could not even balance the Budget.

We come to the present administration and find the same situation. Let us pass by the merits or demerits of the measures which have been enacted, in and of themselves. Nevertheless there has been no stay of any moment of the fall of commodity prices. For a time there was a temporary rise, a temporary assurance of better conditions, and finally back again to the original prices and even lower than they had hitherto been.

I venture to say that the measure which we have here now will not restore the prices of farm commodities for any length of time unless we deal successfully with the money question. It will prove as unsatisfactory in the end as did the Farm Marketing Act. I regard the farm bill now before us as a sincere, honest, heroic effort to be of some service to American agriculture, but it is my belief that unless we have the courage to sit down regardless of party and work out a sound method of inflation, this measure will prove as unsatisfactory in 6 months as did the Farm Marketing Act. This measure will not of itself stop the fall of prices, and like all legislation it will crumble under the avalanche of depression if prices do not rise.

We are seeking by this measure to raise the price of farm commodities at the expense of the urban dweller. Bear in mind, my friends, that the entire income of the United States only a few short years ago was about $83,000,000,000 to $84,000,000,000. It is now about $37,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000. We cannot successfully serve the cause of the American people by raising the price of commodities for one group at the expense of another group. We must find some method by which to increase the income of the Nation as a whole. With this impoverished national income no healthy or permanent relief will come of dividing it up again.

There is only $37,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000 of income to be divided among the American people as an entirety; and unless we can find a means by which to increase that income to the people as a whole, we shall not succeed by giving a little more of it to this group and taking some from that group. That may give a higher price for a time to the farmer, but unless the national income is increased it will be only temporary.

It seems to me, therefore, that any of these measures, however sound they may be in and of themselves, must have the basis of increased price of commodities in order that they may be sustained and be of benefit to the American people.

Take the Economy Act: That act, as a matter of economy, reducing the expenses of the Government, is something with which all of us sympathize. Nevertheless, it was in and of itself a deflationary measure; and all these measures—the Economy Act, the banking bill, and the other measures which have been proposed—have the effect of further deflating American business. Unless we can add to that something in the way of an inflation of the currency, it seems to me inevitable that in a short time we shall land precisely where the other administration landed.

I learn from the press that the President of the United States is giving study and thought to the subject of inflation. I think uncontrolled inflation would be an evil equal to that of deflation; but that, in my opinion, does not for a moment argue against the wisdom and the effect of a reasonable or a controlled policy of inflation. If the President is giving thought to inflation, then I should like to move in harmony with the administration at least until it is determined whether any plan is to be pursued. I say this for the reason that while I favor inflation, yet I know it is a difficult and delicate problem and the Government and all departments of the Government should be in harmony, if possible, in order to insure success.

It is a subject upon which the administration and the Congress should agree before we can be sure of making the program successful. It would be utterly impossible, whatever measure we might pass, to make it successful without the cooperation of the executive department of the Government. The sentiment for inflation is increasing.

I notice that Mr. Walter Lippmann, formerly most conservative on inflation, only a few days ago had this to say:

> The speculative rally has subsided, and the deflation continues to run.

That is exactly what happened under the former administration. The former administration refused to touch the subject of the currency. We were warned, week after week and month after month, that the agitation of it would bring ruin and destruction to the country. The result was that prices continued to fall, deflation continued on its course, and an administration which came into power with an enormous vote and exceptional popularity was driven into retirement. Unless we can reverse the course of events and change the course of commodity prices, nothing in the world can preserve the popularity of any administration, however great it may be.

Mr. Lippmann says:

The idea which gives order and significance to the tasks that lie ahead is that we are engaged in a struggle to arrest the fall of prices, in other words, the deflation, and to bring about a moderate rise in prices, in other words, a controlled inflation.

People speak about "controlled inflation." Nobody expects or wishes uncontrolled inflation. But, says Mr. Lippman, in effect, unless we can arrest the fall of prices, and do so through inflation, the measures thus far enacted into law will be disappointing.

Thus, if the forces of deflation which are bearing down upon American producers are not dealt with, all these measures of Budget balancing and capital reorganization will clearly be quite ineffective. Unless prices rise and incomes increase, the new Budget will soon again be out of balance and the reduced mortgages of farmers and the scaled-down bonds of railroads will soon again be intolerable. It is possible to adjust debts and fixed charges down to a new level only if the new level is at least stable. It is probably practically impossible to adjust all debts and fixed charges down to the catastrophic level to which they have now fallen. Any successful readjustment of fixed charges calls for some substantial rise in prices and stabilization at a somewhat higher level than now prevails.

That, Mr. President, is the great problem before the civilized world today. In England, in France, and throughout all lands this question of how to stay the fall of commodity prices is the one which torments the minds of the great leaders of the nations. I take it that the main purpose of these conferences, singly and afterward collectively, is to find some way by which to stay the fall of commodity prices.

Civilization depends upon finding a solution. I am prepared to vote for any measure—whether in its details it satisfies me or not, whether in its details it seems to me wise or not—I am prepared to vote for any measure which endorses the principle of inflation. If I should vote for this amendment, it would be as an endorsement of inflation, rather than the method.

The Chicago Daily News a day or two since said:

Instead of passing the farm bill, it would be better for the Federal Government to initiate immediately a program of deliberate and controlled inflation, using the machinery established by the Emergency Banking Act. The experience of England since its departure from the gold standard has robbed such programs of much of their terror. "Off gold" English commodity prices and living costs have been stabilized and export trade has expanded slightly. There has been a decrease in unemployment. Those are important gains for a nation struggling toward commercial rehabilitation.

Professor Thompson, of the Columbia School of Political Science, a few days since said:

We are face to face with a grave situation at the moment, and currency reform has become imperative. The crushing weight of the depression has fallen upon debtors and producers without working capital, and they should not be left to the tender mercy of the relentless creditor and the sheriff. If, during an era of expansion and excessive credit, debts were contracted which cannot be liquidated, distress sales of commodities and foreclosure of real estate bring despair to the man who cannot quickly mobilize his assets to meet the demands of his banker.

Manipulations of greedy bankers and money lenders and the reluctance of capitalists and conservative statesmen to depart from past practice and the letter of the law which has brought on in large measure such deplorable conditions may well urge us on to the verge of desperation. No matter that live credits are being translated into bad debts, defaulted mortgages, and uncollected judgments, the banker who cashed in on an inflated market will not hear to a devaluation of the dollar; he wants to increase its potency and purchasing power.

The Democratic platform on which Mr. Roosevelt was elected stands for sound money, and with that principle we all are in accord.

Certainly we are. I do not admit for a moment that in arguing for inflation, for a cheaper dollar, I am arguing for a dishonest or unsound dollar. I maintain, as I have said here before, that a dollar which it takes three times as much wheat to buy, or three or four times as many hogs to buy as it did 2 or 3 years ago, is not an honest dollar or a sound dollar. What we are asking for, Mr. President, is such dealing with the money question as will give to the business men of the country, the farmers of the country, and all who must transact business, an honest measurement of values from year to year.

Suppose the price of commodities continues to fall: What becomes of the proposition of scaling down the debts under this program which we have before us? Although the debt may have been scaled down under the fall which is taking place, it will be only a short time until the farmer proportionately is in no better position to redeem himself than he was before it took place.

Suppose we undertake to balance the Budget, and succeed in balancing the Budget today, and prices continue to fall, and taxes continue to decrease, as of late. We will have an unbalanced Budget from month to month, just as we had under the previous administration. There is no escaping the fact that we are up against the proposition of considering the money question, and in order to do so successfully we must have the cooperation of the administration.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest to the Senator along that line, in connection with this legislation, is not the farmer entitled to the same kind of a dollar for his products that he is obliged to pay his taxes with, and his interest on his obligations, and other items of expenditure?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is true. The farmer has seen his taxes rise in the last 10 years 300 percent. That is on the face of the paper; but when he comes to sell his commodity to secure means with which to pay his taxes, he finds that his taxes have risen from 600 to 700 percent. It is the same way with his mortgage. He may have had a mortgage of $5,000 in 1929. Now, although it stands as the same upon paper, he has a mortgage of from ten to twelve thousand dollars, through no act of his own, through no additional loan, through no change in the note, but through the constant increase in the value of the dollar.

Since 1929 bank deposits have shrunk $21,000,000,000. Eight and a half billion is in closed banks; two and a half billion is hoarded currency; and ten billions has been the result of a reduction of bank credits.

The following bank deposits have been frozen since the beginning of the depression:

1930	$864,700,000
1931	1,691,500,000
1932	730,400,000
1933, Mar. 3 to Mar. 22, about	5,000,000,000

Mr. President, if I had my way about it, I would be ready to attach a clause to this bill giving the Government the power and authority, and directing it, to pay 60 cents on the dollar for every one of these frozen dollars and take an assignment. That would be one way in which, with justice and perfect safety and fairness to American depositors, we could increase or inflate the currency of this country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment. While I do not propose to discuss it this afternoon, I would follow that as rapidly as I could by a bank guaranty law. If we are going to punish men for hoarding, let us first give them a safe place to deposit their money.

Mr. KING. While it is important, of course, to have an increase in the circulating medium, does not the Senator believe that the important thing is to find work for the people, and, therefore, if necessary, to have the Federal Government engage in large activities of a public character, but primarily to encourage private industry to resume activities, and to furnish employment for the millions who are out of employment? It seems to me that the important thing is to get men to work, and, of course, if by inflation, "controlled inflation", to use the expression so commonly used, that could be effectuated and the result accomplished in part, at least, then controlled inflation might be important.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know how we are to put men to work and keep them at work with a continuous fall in the prices of commodities. I do not know how we are to restore confidence to the American people with a continuous fall in the prices of commodities. I do not know how to arrest the fall in the prices of commodities except through action regarding the money question. If there is another way and a sounder way and a safer way, I am only interested in the result.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator agree that if four or five millions of unemployed could now be put back to work in profitable employment, that would increase production and increase consumption and, pro tanto, augment the prosperity of the country, or at least relieve us from some of the depression?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if we put men to building public buildings, post offices, and so forth, in my opinion it will not produce the result which the Senator desires. If we can put men back to work at productive work, producing something which the human family needs, that would be of help, but if we are simply to build public buildings, in the end, in my judgment, the result will be unsatisfactory. We will have the public buildings on our hands, there will be no income from them, and we will have the expense of taking care of them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, in the construction of public buildings, brick and lumber and all the essentials which go into the construction of buildings will be required, and employment would be furnished to people in providing those essentials.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes, Mr. President; we could put men out here on the street digging holes and filling them up, and the machinery that would have to be used would have to be produced somewhere, and that would give some employment; but unless we are putting their efforts into some line of industry or some line of production which brings some return to the human family in the way of benefit through producing the things which they desire, the things which they must wear, or the things which they must eat, in my opinion, in the end there will be failure. I do not mean to say that in order to keep men from actually starving we might not have to do these things which we are now talking about. What I am speaking of is the restoration of the prices of commodities as the ultimate solution of the depression through which we are passing.

Mr. President, I have a statement before me, prepared by a research bureau, and I want to read a paragraph from it and call attention to some figures to show how utterly powerless we are to protect the American farmer or the American business man in his markets unless we can deal with this money question. This writer says:

> On the next page we will see an interesting comparison of the experience of the gold-standard countries, the restricted-exchange countries, and the "managed-currency" countries, during 1931 and 1932 in the matter of pig-iron and steel production—the best index of general business conditions within these countries. This study shows that the managed currency countries achieved a remarkable stability in their production, whereas the advocates of "sound money" would have predicted uncontrolled inflation and trade once a country definitely departed from gold. In the case of the restricted-exchange countries, it shows a 36-percent decrease and in the gold-standard countries a 44-percent decrease, with the most serious decline of all in the case of the United States. If we continue our present monetary policy much longer, this study would indicate that even Russia would pass us in the production of pig iron and ferro-alloys. One could list a considerable amount of other evidence which would prove beyond question that the real instability in currencies at the present time occurs in the case of those definitely linked to gold and not those "managed" with the welfare of a country's citizens in mind.

In support of that I want to put into the RECORD the figures which he has prepared, showing the prices of commodities in the gold-standard countries and the prices of commodities in the managed-currency countries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is true that the managed-currency countries are now invading the markets of the United States, in addition to having already to a large extent taken possession of our foreign markets. At the present time the managed-currency countries have what is in effect a very high protective tariff by reason of their cheaper currency.

Suppose we undertake to lower the tariffs in this country in order to permit people to sell to us, and thereby find a means by which to buy from us. While that is taking place, the cheap-currency countries may so manipulate their currencies as, notwithstanding the lowering of the tariff, to give them the advantage of a high protective tariff upon their part. It is dangerous to lower tariffs until the currency question is adjusted.

There is no means by which we can stabilize anything—the tariff, prices, our markets—until there is a stabilized currency, both in this country and internationally.

There is no one in the United States who is more interested or should be more interested in the coming international conferences than the farmer. The farmer sells abroad—the cotton farmer 55 percent of his product, the tobacco farmer 41 percent, the wheat and rye farmers 20 to 22 percent, the lard producers 23 percent. Until we can get back these foreign markets upon a reasonable basis there can be little permanent prosperity to the American farmer, and we can never get back those markets so that they will be ours with any degree of certainty until the international currency question is adjusted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that when the last tariff bill was before the Senate for consideration, a number of Senators insisted that we needed foreign markets for our surplus products. However, when it was shown that many commodities were imported into the United States in insignificant quantities the tariff rates were put very high, with the avowed purpose of excluding imports from the United States. If we have that mentality and pursue that policy of excluding commodities by tariff duties, then it seems to me that much of the argument my friend is making, with which I substantially agree, would lose its potency. Many Americans, unfortunately, during the past few years have indicated a determination to have no commerce with other nations. Apparently they expect to find export markets, but absolutely refuse to receive imports in exchange.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, I am what they call a low-tariff man on this side of the Chamber. I have voted for a tariff bill but once since I have been in the Senate, 26 years, because I always thought the rates were too high. Nevertheless, I am not willing to lower the tariff duties in this country so long as the managed-currency countries, through their processes, can ship their goods over any tariff wall we may establish. I think tariff adjustments must go hand in hand with currency adjustments.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is perfectly evident, and I may say admitted by the leading economists of Great Britain, that they are maintaining the pound sterling at the present level, as they say, to equalize costs of production in the United States and in Great Britain. Whether that reason be sound or not sound, I am calling attention to the admission.

It was only recently that I asked one of their prominent economists, who I think may speak with some authority, what, in his opinion, would be the action of the British Government if we should reduce the gold content of the dollar one half. He said:

> Of course, I cannot speak for the British Government, but I think the logical thing for them to do, and what I believe they would do, so as to maintain the same status quo as that which exists today, would be to reduce the value of the pound sterling in gold or dollars to $1.75.

Just one other thing and I will be through. There is a race for the depreciation of currencies in the world, as there was a race once for high tariffs, and probably still is, and for the same purpose. The race for the depreciation of currency can have no effect whatever except that the currencies will go to no value, as the German mark did. Consequently it seems absolutely essential that there must be a stabilization of currencies in all these commercial countries, based on metals, something that is fixed or approximately fixed as to quantity and production. If that is not accomplished, then this fight will go on, to the disruption of currencies and exchange values and the whole economic system of the world.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. One aspect of this question which puzzles me somewhat is this: If these foreign countries with depreciated currencies have invaded our market to the point of dumping, how is it that we have maintained the balance of trade in our favor within the last year or two?

Mr. BORAH. I do not have the general figures, but I do know that our foreign markets for farm products have been greatly curtailed. Whether that has been made up by exportations of products of another kind, I do not know. I know that the foreign markets for our farm products have fallen away. For instance, the South during the last fiscal year sold about $200,000,000 worth of cotton abroad, while in a normal year they would sell $700,000,000 worth.

Mr. WAGNER. That is because of the inability of foreign markets to purchase, because of decreased purchasing power, but, as I understand, the relationship is the same; that we as a Nation still have a balance of trade in our favor.

Mr. BORAH. I am not sure that the Senator is correct about the figures; I do not know about that; but, for instance, take the fishing industry on the Pacific coast; Japan and other cheap-currency countries have practically taken possession of it, they have almost closed our industries, our business is practically at a standstill. That is a physical, demonstrable fact; and they are doing it by reason of their cheap currency.

Something has been said this afternoon about the forthcoming international economic conference and some doubt has been cast upon the possibility of its success. Of course, no one knows what can be accomplished; but if there is any one enterprise in which the whole United States is interested and to which it ought to give its support, in a sincere and intelligent way, it is the international conference which is to be held, we hope, some time early in the summer. Without the solution of such questions as the currency question, as the disarmament question, and kindred questions, without the solution of those problems as international problems, the United States must readjust her entire industrial and financial policies and proceed along an entirely different line from what it has proceeded since the organization of the Government. We will have to turn our attention to economic nationalism to an extent never dreamed of heretofore. Every reasonable effort should first be made to adjust these great essential economic problems.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. The United States must do that, because, as suggested by the Senator from Nevada a few moments ago, with this race in the form of currency depreciation going forward, there is no bottom except the abyss. Now I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Idaho is speaking of the impending meeting of the nations looking toward some kind of an agreement as to currencies. Does he think that we ought to wait on that conference in an attempt to arrest a condition that is so notorious in this country?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, my candid opinion is that we shall have to wait for some time. We may enact legislation, we may attempt to go forward as we have for the last four or five years without the adjustment of these international economic problems, but, in my opinion, we shall be disappointed in any legislation which we may enact. I do not mean to say that we should not ameliorate the situation as best we may, that we should not administer relief where it is possible to administer relief, but I am speaking of the permanent return of normal prosperity in this country and throughout the world. Without the adjustment of those international problems, I myself cannot see any immediate return or any return at all of normal conditions.

Mr. SMITH. One of the reasons I ask the Senator from Idaho the question is that he read some statistics to show that the countries that have a managed currency are already relieving themselves and are on the upward road, while those that are managed by their currency have gone in the other direction. It seems to me that if England and other countries have been able to maintain a more tolerable condition for their people, through their recognition of the necessity of modifying their currency laws, we certainly ought to follow suit to whatever degree we can bring about relief.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, if these questions cannot be adjusted internationally, undoubtedly we shall have to adjust ourselves to the situation; but, in my opinion, the sound, the secure, the safe way to deal with the money question is through an international agreement, through an international understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I assume the Senator has in mind an arrangement for the stabilization of exchange?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator, as I understand, does not advocate the effort on the part of the Government of the United States to depreciate its currency in competition with nations that compete with us for trade and commerce?

Mr. BORAH. What I was saying was that the only safe way to stabilize international exchange is through international agreement, and I think it is the same way with the silver question with which we are dealing. I think the safe, sound, secure way to deal with it is through international agreement. I very much doubt whether the United States alone can do very much with the silver question.

I know that my friend from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] holds an entirely different view; but if the President of the United States, as he has stated he is undertaking to do, can bring about a stabilization of the silver question through international agreement, it will be more permanent and better for the people of the United States than for us to attempt to do it by ourselves. While I say that, at the same time I recognize that some things may be done to ameliorate the situation here, but there can be no permanent prosperity and there can be no permanent relief, in my judgment, until we settle some of the international problems; and the most important conference to convene since the conference at Versailles, which ended the World War, will be the international economic conference to which attention is now being directed by the President of the United States. It is my deliberate opinion that the happiness and the prosperity and even the future stability of many governments depend upon the success of the conference which is to be held. If the peoples of the world are to pursue the course which they have pursued since the Versailles conference, if economic war is to take the place of military war and to continue indefinitely, God only knows what future has in store for the peoples of the world.

Mr. VANDENBERG and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Michigan, who, I think, rose first.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is discussing managed currency and its success abroad. Manifestly its success, if any, has depended upon sympathetic management. I submit to the Senator that there is no chance for sympathetic management of any of these propositions in the United States under the existing attitude of the Federal Reserve Board. I assert that there has never been a moment when the Federal Reserve Board has given sympathetic ear or assistance or cooperation to a single effort the Congress has made in respect to the expansion of the currency; and I submit to the Senator that if we propose to do anything further by way of effort in this direction, we shall have to be more specific than we have ever been heretofore.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, one of the easiest things in the world to do is to get rid of that Board if that be necessary.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator just one thought?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am quite impressed with what the Senator says as to the importance of an international agreement, but I feel, too, that the United States has not come out very well when it has entered into international agreements. With reference to silver we have had four or five different international conferences.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator is in error as to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have had three or four of them, anyway; there was one at Brussels.

Mr. BORAH. We are in a new era.

Mr. FLETCHER. But, anyway, we never got anywhere in any of those conferences; that has been the trouble.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I now remember my question, having been reminded of it by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. The Senator from Idaho does not think that there ought to be any restraint on us in voting for remonetizing silver today, does he, because a conference is going to be held? If we can do anything to help, we should do it, should we not?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator wants my candid opinion about it, the way to deal with the silver question is through an international conference. I, in part, represent a silver State, and I have no prejudices, I suppose, which would blind me to the value of silver in our monetary system; I think it has an important place in our monetary system; but I do not see how we by ourselves can be successful in placing silver in the monetary systems of the world. I believe in the restoration of silver to its proper place in our monetary system, but I have long entertained the view that such restoration in order to be successful and permanent should be through international adjustment.

As I said a moment ago, if I vote for this amendment it will be because I am voting for a subdivision of the question of inflation. My deliberate judgment is that the way to deal with the silver question is through an international agreement, and that we ought to support the President in the way which will be most conducive to his success in that respect. If I knew that the President desired that this measure be not adopted, I would vote against it. He is to carry the silver cause through the international conference, and I would not want to embarrass him in so vital a matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. In just a moment I will yield. In other words, I think much depends on the success of the international conference, and I am willing to adjust my relationship to that by my action here in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I can inform the Senator from Idaho that the President does not desire either of these amendments adopted.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. I shall not vote for the amendment, as I feel nothing should be done to imperil the success of his efforts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (and other Senators). Question!

Mr. ASHURST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let the yeas and nays be ordered, and then I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. On that question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I beg leave to make a short statement, as I will be compelled in a few moments to leave the Chamber. I have a pair, so that my vote will not be lost; but I wish to say that I have already, during the speech of the Senator from Montana, called attention to a number of facts which, in my opinion, are in support of the remonetization of silver in aid of international trade. I am going to ask leave of the Senate to place in the RECORD as part of my remarks two statements which I have made on this subject and which thoroughly express my views.

I am of the opinion that there is more encouragement for favorable action by the approaching international conference on the subject of silver money, as well as all other forms of monetary exchange, than there has been in a very long time. I think that the necessity for agreement is known to statesmen everywhere. Of course, it is difficult for one nation that is deriving an advantage from the present situation to forego that advantage, but all nations realize that the result will be complete destruction of the monetary systems of the world if the contest in depreciation shall continue without end.

I have never yet offered a proposal such as that contained in the amendment of the Senator from Montana. I have offered several bills looking to the purchase of silver by the United States, with the object of bringing back the world price of silver to its normal parity eventually based on production and consumption. I have introduced bills that have attempted to eliminate the unnatural supply that has been thrown on the markets of the world. I feel, however, that through an international conference we will be able to go very much farther than that.

We have had one vote already on the same bill the Senator now proposes as an amendment; I voted against it, and all except three western Senators voted against it. It gave the impression throughout the world that there was no substantial sentiment in the Congress of the United States in favor of the remonetization of silver. I am unwilling to have such an impression go out to the world. I know that there is a strong sentiment for the remonetization of silver. There is a great difference of opinion as to the method by which it should be accomplished, the limitations under which it should be accomplished, the period of time over which it should be accomplished; and yet the overwhelming sentiment, in my opinion, today of the people of the United States is for the remonetization of silver.

There is a grave distinction between bimetallism and abandonment of the gold standard. If one speaks of monometallism or bimetallism in the sense of a single measure or a dual measure, that is one thing; if one is thinking of monometallism as the base, whether it be gold or silver, with a maintenance of parity on the national ration of 16 to 1, that is an entirely different theory.

The United States might have the gold standard as its measure of money value and maintain, as it does today, the parity of silver on the basis of 16 to 1. China might have the silver standard and yet maintain in gold all other currencies that come into China on the basis of 16 to 1 in China. The main proposition is not to attempt to force on the world any particular standard of measure, but to have such standards of measures as are adopted throughout the world maintained as nearly as possible on a fixed standard of ratio so that the exchange value of money may be the relative value as between the countries, so that speculation in exchange may cease, so that moneys may not be used for the purpose of bearing down or raising the prices of commodities or giving one country an advantage in world trade over another country. These are the things we seek.

My views have been expressed time and again in this body as to what I think are the practical means to accomplish this purpose. But I want to say now that I do not think it will be injurious in any sense of the word for this body to express its views with regard to the remonetization of silver in our own country. I cannot see that it will. There are others who feel that it might have a deterrent effect on the international conference. I do not see how it can have. I believe that the world should know that this great country of ours is taking the silver question seriously—and when I say "the silver question" I mean the use of silver money throughout the world—that we recognize silver as money, that it always has been money and probably always will be money for five sixths of the people of the world, and that we realize it has its effect on trade through exchange with gold-standard countries. I think the world should know that. For that reason I ask leave that I may incorporate in the RECORD two statements which I have made with regard to the subject. I would not make the request except, first, that I know the Senate is anxious to vote; and, secondly, it is absolutely essential that I leave immediately for an appointment which I have at the other end of the Capitol.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Nevada is granted.

The statements referred to are as follows:

SILVER AND THE COMMODITY PRICE LEVEL

The fundamental and underlying cause of the present world crisis is the fall in commodity prices. The purchasing power of money has increased or, in other words, the value of commodities in terms of money has decreased. The prosperity of industry, trade, and commerce depends upon the ability of people to purchase not only the bare necessities of life but those things which make for comfort, enlightenment, high standards of living, and happiness. This purchasing power ultimately goes back to the price of commodities. The normal purchasing power that existed in most countries prior to 1930 has depreciated to its disastrous present level through the destructive fall in the price of commodities. The agricultural problem and the prosperity of agriculture, which is admitted to be the basis of all prosperity, is the problem of raising commodity prices to a point where there will be a profit to the producer. Today many of our chief agricultural products are selling below the cost of production. The effect upon the purchasing power of the producers is obvious. At least one third of our people are directly dependent for their purchasing power upon profits derived from the products of agriculture. When these people are unable to purchase the products of the manufacturer, the manufacturer is compelled to reduce his output and as he reduces his output he discharges labor. Labor, as a group, is admittedly second in importance as a purchaser in our markets. As labor is compelled to join the ranks of the unemployed it also joins the ranks of the nonpurchasers and thus continues the process of the necessary reduction in plant operations. There is a vicious and unending circle which cannot and never will be terminated until the purchasing power of those engaged in agriculture is raised through an increase in the price of their products to a level that will show a profit to the industry. The value of lands is dependent upon the profits that may be derived from them and that, in turn, is dependent upon the profits that may be obtained from the commodities raised thereon. The value of manufacturing plants is determined by their earning capacity and no plant operating at 15 or 20 percent of its normal capacity can show a profit.

So when commodity prices are below the cost of a profit level then property values decrease. As property decreases the power of governments to obtain moneys from taxation decreases, whether such taxes be levied against physical properties or income. So the Budget problem is inevitably and eternally involved in the price of commodities. Our real problem cannot be solved until the prices of commodities are raised not only above the cost of production but to a level that will show profit. When plant operations are reduced through loss of purchasers, car loadings fall off and nothing can restore such loss save the restoration of the purchasing power of the people within our country. So again I repeat that all our problems, both individual and governmental, are involved in the problem of commodity prices.

There is no overproduction as measured by the normal demands of our people for consumption. Production is less than it was prior to 1930, and yet our population has increased and the desires of our people for those things that they consumed prior to 1930 are unchanged. Surplus products in practically every country of the world have beaten down domestic prices. These surplus products restrained from their natural foreign markets have been thrown back on domestic markets with the natural inevitable destruction of domestic prices.

This cessation or stagnation of foreign trade may be due to several causes, but undoubtedly it is chiefly due to two major causes. Tariff walls erected by 41 governments of the world in the last few years for the purpose of protecting their own markets against importation from foreign countries have undoubtedly been one of the major causes in the present stagnation of trade. The second and perhaps the most fundamental cause is the depreciation in the currencies in most of the countries of the world as measured by the gold standard. This depreciation has had the same effect as a tariff wall, and in most cases has multiplied the effect of these walls. Even Great Britain's currency since she went off the gold-standard basis has depreciated over 30 percent. The currencies of other countries have depreciated very much more. Great Britain today in purchasing our products must buy our gold exchange with her depreciated currency and then pay our gold-standard price for our products. She can buy much more of the same products in countries where currency has depreciated as much or to a greater extent than has hers.

It seems to me inevitable that we will be isolated from world trade unless we lower the value as related to gold of our own currency or that the other countries of the world formerly on the gold standard restore their currencies to their normal value in relation to ours. We do not desire, if it may be prevented, to lower the standard of value of our currency. It would have a disrupting effect upon our economic system and upon many of our financial obligations and institutions.

The difficulty of other governments returning to the gold standard is obvious. What aid our Government may give them is not clear. The United States and France have nearly three fourths of the monetary gold of the world. The problem of the redistribution of this gold in the immediate future at least appears almost insurmountable, and yet those governments that have gone off the gold standard cannot return to the gold standard until the normal distribution of gold throughout the world has been restored. I do not propose today to discuss the solution of this problem.

There is another money-exchange problem that is destroying our export trade. I refer to the problem involved in the tremendous depreciation of the price of silver and its consequent effect upon the purchasing power of those people of the world who use silver as their standard of currency. Over half the people of the world have no money save silver money. They have never used any other kind of money. To them it is money—good money that maintains its par value within their own country.

In discussing the silver problem I cannot too strongly emphasize the fact that I am discussing it not as a commodity but as money, and by money I cannot too strongly insist that what I mean is whatever is used as the means of payment, whether it be gold, silver, paper, checks, or anything else which is accepted as a means whereby a payment can be made. Silver as a commodity has had a larger fall than the average commodity. If, however, it were merely a commodity, there would be no more excuse for raising its price than for any other commodity of equal importance, and its importance as a commodity is not great any more than the importance of gold as a commodity is great. When, however, you consider it as a means of payment its importance becomes very great. As many people in the world use it as money as use gold or the currencies attached to gold, and as to the silver-using countries, their money has depreciated in terms of gold more than 60 percent since 1929. By raising the price of silver to a normal figure you will do more than any other one thing to increase the purchasing power of the world. Increased purchasing power means increased demand, and increased demand means raising commodity prices.

I wish briefly to outline what has actually happened as a result of the abnormal decrease in the purchasing power of silver and to show by the facts in connection with the supply and demand of silver how the very moderate plan which I propose can remedy this situation.

CHINA'S FOREIGN TRADE IN THE SILVER MARKET

Take China as an illustration. The currency of China is based on the silver standard. So far as the internal trade and business of China is concerned, the fluctuation in the price of silver in terms of gold has a negligible effect, but when it comes to purchases by China abroad from countries whose currencies are attached to the gold standard the price of silver has a marked effect, and the recent drastic decline in the price of silver from around 65 cents an ounce in 1926 to 27 cents an ounce at the present time has had a profound effect. Its effect is not only injurious to the present trade of China, but is even more alarming when viewed from a long-term trend. Let me briefly point out these effects. First, from the point of view of prophecies made of the inevitable effect of the drastic decline in silver which has occurred by those best qualified to judge of the probable effect; second, by presenting to you the actual results which have occurred from this decline in the price of silver; and, third, to outline the beneficial effects which will result from a rise in the price of silver to its normal ratio with the currencies of the other countries of the world.

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and president of the Board of Trade of Great Britain appointed on March 18, 1930, the British Economic Mission to the Far East to inquire into the present condition of British trade with China and Japan and to report what action should be taken to develop and increase that trade. Mr. Ernest Thompson was appointed as chairman of the mission. The mission left London in September 1930 and returned to London in April of 1931, and during this time they made an exhaustive investigation of the trade situation in both Japan and China at a cost to the British Government of some £60,000. Their report, in dealing with the silver question, makes the following statements:

"At page 111, section 232:

"'The silver question: There exists in China today one outstanding problem which faces all nations desirous of selling their goods in the China market. The deplorably low silver values and the consequently much-reduced buying of the vast populace are factors contributing to restrict the increase of imports into China from foreign countries. Finding it increasingly difficult to buy (for payment in gold) goods from abroad, China will be driven to discover ways and means of producing her own requirements. Should she continue to remain on a greatly depreciated silver basis for some years it is obvious that she will of necessity not only quickly enlarge her industrial capacity and manufacture goods now made in foreign countries but will be able to export many of such goods to markets abroad now being served by Great Britain.' * * *

"And at page 127, section 302:

"'The continued depreciation of the value of silver has enormously reduced the purchasing power of China, and if it continues will hasten the growth of industries in China, the manufactures of which will compete with imported products from Great Britain. Reduction in the value of silver also increases the difficulties of China in meeting interest on foreign loans and so compels her to raise further revenue by increasing import duties. If the depreciation of silver were to affect the foreign-loan service, much damage would be inflicted on British interests.'

"303. 'In our opinion, every means should be sought of bringing about the stabilization of silver and so of restoring to China her full purchasing power.'"

On September 22, 1931, the China Association of Great Britain, under the chairmanship of Sir Robert Horne, formerly Chancellor of the Exchequer, adopted the following resolution:

"That this meeting states its conviction that the raising of the price of silver and its restoration to a place in the world's monetary system offers the quickest and most effective remedy to the present disastrous fall in prices, and expresses the hope that the governments principally concerned will at the earliest possible moment confer with this object in view."

In 1926 Mr. Montagu Norman, governor, and Sir Charles Addis, a member of the court, of the Bank of England, and certainly among the greatest authorities in the world today on currency questions, gave the following joint evidence:

"I think that one has to bear in mind the interaction between gold and silver prices. There is a reaction upon gold when an extreme fall or rise takes place in the value of silver, which is none the less serious, because it is indirect and not very apparent on the surface. The consequential changes in the price generally and in trade conditions which would be produced, the disturbance to the world's peace and confidence, the interference with the long-established social habits of the people of India in the use of silver, the shock to the reliance of a great country like China upon silver as a medium of currency and a common store of value could not fail to have important effects upon the gold prices of countries in Europe and, indeed, in America."

Now, let us analyze briefly what has happened to the import trade of China since the occurrence of the drastic decline in the price of silver, and to its industrial development. In 1928, 30.5 percent of the exports of the United States to China consisted of crude materials, 10.1 percent consisted of foodstuffs, 12.1 percent consisted of semimanufactured goods, 47.8 percent consisted of finished manufactured goods. In 1931, 49 percent of the imports consisted of crude materials, 13.9 percent consisted of foodstuffs, 10.7 percent of semimanufactured goods, and 26.4 percent of finished manufactured goods. The purchases of China from the United States of raw materials actually increased, while the purchase of finished manufactured goods were cut approximately in half.

This situation is still more strikingly shown by the report of China's import trade with the principal countries of the world. The decline of total imports from 1928 to 1931 was 45 percent. The decline in raw products and foodstuffs, however, was only 12 percent, while the decline in semimanufactured and manufactured articles was 55 percent. The significance of these figures is shown by an analysis by economic classes of the export trade of the United States to the whole of Europe. In 1928, 37.9 percent of the exports from the United States to Europe consisted of crude materials, 18 percent of foodstuffs, 14.8 percent of semimanufactured goods, and 29.2 percent of finished manufactures. In 1931, 25.5 percent of our exports were crude materials, 20.2 percent were foodstuffs, 13.4 percent were semimanufactured goods, and 40.9 percent were finished manufactured goods.

In other words, the percentage of our total sales to China consisting of crude materials has increased during this period, and the principal decline has been in manufactured goods, while the contrary is true of our trade with Europe, where the percentage of crude materials has declined and the percentage of manufactured goods has increased. This can perhaps best be shown by examining a three-cornered transaction. For many years Great Britain has had a large business in the sale of cotton piece goods to China and the United States has had a large business in the sale of raw cotton to England. Let us examine what has happened to this three-cornered trade. In 1928 Great Britain sold 153,399,100 square yards of cotton piece goods to China. In 1931 she sold 41,553,400 square yards, less than one third of her sales in 1928. In 1928 England bought 1,997,000 bales of cotton from the United States and in 1931 she bought 899,000 bales of cotton from the United States, a drop of more than 50 percent. In 1928 China purchased 170,000 bales of cotton from the United States and in 1931 she purchased 880,000 bales of cotton from the United States.

What is the significance of these figures? The reports of our trade commissioners to China are full of it. Throughout these reports are constant references to the declining imports, especially of manufactured goods, by China and a marked increase in the industrial development in China. The reason is simple. The purchasing power of a silver dollar in China has remained constant—increasing, if anything—so far as China is concerned, while, on the other hand, the purchasing power in terms of foreign merchandise has declined, decreasing to 40 percent of its 1926 level. The result is inevitable. China is buying where she can buy most cheaply, and that is at home; and to supply her requirements she has gone into industrial development, which is already seriously crippling our sales to China and which, if continued for a substantial length of time, will not only provide all of her requirements but constitute the most destructive competition for the rest of the world that the world has ever known. Our labor costs, to meet this competition, will be forced to the level of labor costs in China.

This situation has been aggravated in the fact that, as her foreign indebtedness is in gold and her normal income is in silver, the Government has been forced to place its import duties on a gold basis to provide sufficient revenue for loan service, thus increasing the barrier and raising the cost of foreign goods in China.

I quote the following extracts from reports of the Department of Commerce. On January 1, 1932, the China Monthly Trade Report says:

"China's industries enjoyed greater prosperity generally than in numerous years past. Increased import tariffs put into effect early in the year and low silver exchange, coupled with comparatively peaceful conditions, were the principal favorable factors. * * *"

Again, Mr. J. J. Ehrhardt, Chinese trade commissioner of the Department of Commerce, reporting in 1932, says:

"Increased import tariffs and low silver exchange have had an enormous effect on recent industrial expansion. * * *

"While the expansion of native industry has had the effect of decreasing the value of many manufactured imports, it has, at the same time, increased considerably the demand for many raw products. American exporters of manufactured articles have found it necessary to establish branch factories in the port cities in order to hold the market. These in most cases are only for the partial manufacture and assembly of goods but undoubtedly will eventually expand to the extent of manufacturing almost entirely within the country. While America has participated only to a small extent in branch factories in China, other nationalities, especially Japan, have come in in considerably greater volume. Japanese and British establishments now predominate. Commodities now being manufactured in port cities of China include such items as batteries and flashlights; electrical equipment, such as telephones, transformers, electrical fittings, and appliances; radio equipment, textile machinery, steel sash, and, recently, railway cars."

The American consulate general at Shanghai on October 4, 1932, reported as follows:

"Spindles in 1915, 1,008,986; in 1932, about 4,900,000. Looms in 1915 amounted to 4,564 and in 1932 to 44,000. Cotton mills in China in 1913 numbered 31, and in 1932, 127. In 1925 there were 719,000,000 pounds of cotton yarn and 120,000,000 yards of cotton cloth produced, which by 1932 had risen to 960,000,000 pounds of cotton yarn and 810,000,000 yards of cloth."

Not only this, but the same report shows that China is proceeding to supply its own raw materials, as no less than 6,000,000 acres have been planted to cotton in 1932.

I could extend these extracts indefinitely, but they would only be additional proof of the uncontrovertible fact that the drastic drop in the price of silver has not only had the immediate effect of a great loss in current trade with China but, what is even a more disastrous tendency to the western world, of enormously expanding industrial development of the country, which, if continued, will make China not only self-sustaining but the most devastating competitor that we have ever known in the neutral markets of the world.

A rise in the price of silver decreases the cost of foreign merchandise in China as compared to local merchandise, and must inevitably stimulate purchases from abroad with a resulting beneficial effect on the general level of prices. A rising price of silver increases the local costs in China and must inevitably result in checking artificial industrial development in that country. A rising price of silver strengthens the position of the Chinese Government in lessening the burden of their foreign-debt service and creating the possibility of foreign loans. All of these results are highly desirable from our point of view and must inevitably have a tendency to improve the world price level.

The same condition which I have outlined in connection with China applies to every country when the ultimate purchaser must pay for our products in silver. Take India for example: It is true that the British Government has taken steps whereby the Indian silver rupee has been placed on a sterling exchange basis, but a comparatively small percentage of the monetary wealth of the Indian people is in the silver rupee. Since time immemorial the savings of the people of India have been represented by gold and silver bullion. It is estimated that 4¼ billion ounces of silver is held by the people of India as their hoarded wealth. The recent drop in the price of silver has decreased the purchasing power of this hoarded wealth of India in terms of gold by $1,615,000,000. Economists will tell you that the purchasing power of the people of a country is dependent upon the amount of their sales. This may be true as to current transactions, but completely ignores savings, and the principal purpose of savings is to enable people to retain their purchasing power during periods of temporary depression. Certainly, to cut the savings of a nation 60 percent in value is to curtail by 60 percent the purchasing power represented by these savings.

In addition to these direct results a chain of additional results has followed in the wake of the present drastic drop in the price of silver. It has had the effect of destroying the confidence of people in silver as a currency. Indo-China and Siam have abandoned the silver standard and attached their currencies to gold. This has created an additional burden on our gold supply, admittedly none too large for the requirements of the countries previously on the gold standard.

All the world understands the injurious effects which have resulted from the depreciation of gold currencies. It cannot be successfully gainsaid (?) that every one of these injurious effects followed and are identically the same in the case of the depreciation in the value of silver in silver-using countries as the effect of the depreciation in the value of gold currencies in gold-standard countries.

THE CAUSES FOR THE DROP IN THE PRICE OF SILVER

Let us consider the chief causes of the depreciation of the price of silver. It has not been due to overproduction, because the production of silver during this period has decreased from 260,970,029 ounces throughout the world in 1929 to 160,600,000 ounces in 1932. In fact, so far as the question of mine production of silver is concerned, as over 70 percent of the silver produced in the world is produced as a by-product of other metals, the natural tendency of production is to shrink with declining prices and increase with rising prices so as to provide the natural stabilizing effect. While it has not been due to overproduction, it has been due to oversupply—actual and potential. First, Great Britain, France, and Belgium, after the war, started debasing their silver coins and throwing the residue of silver on the markets of the world. This caused an oversupply by the normal demand for silver. Then in 1928 the British Government for India commenced to melt up its silver rupee coins that were in the treasury and to dispose of the metal as bullion on the world's market. Over 500,000,000 ounces of silver have been dumped on the markets of the world from such sources since 1924.

The Treasury of India was authorized to melt up any quantity of silver coins and sell them in any quantities, at any time and at any price. This sale of silver commenced in 1927 and has continued. It has not only created an oversupply with all its bearing effects, but the maintenance of this policy, the threat that accompanies it and the large supply of silver still available for such purposes has undermined confidence as to any stable value in the price of silver. I present herewith the table appearing on page 1839, giving the world production of silver from 1919 to 1932, and showing the supply of silver thrown on the markets of the world during this period through the debasement of currencies. The significant fact about this table, as I have already indicated, is the constancy in the mining supply of silver and the fact that the oversupply with its resulting depressing influence on the price of silver, has been exclusively an artificial one. The world has been called upon to absorb the purely artificial and abnormal supply of nearly 550,000,000 ounces of silver in this way. The redeeming feature of this situation is that this artificial supply of silver is, except in the case of the Indian Government, largely exhausted and, in fact, the tendency has been reversed and the European governments are now purchasing silver and reintroducing silver subsidiary coinage.

The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of the House has recently conducted exhaustive hearings on the question of the supply and demand of silver, the testimony introduced before the House committee proving the following: That the only large government supply of silver hanging over the market is that held by the British Government for India. After including this supply an increase in the price of silver to 50 cents an ounce will probably bring out not more than 350,000,000 ounces of silver as a general market supply, with the probabilities that any definite step taken to raise the price of silver to its normal and natural level would so stimulate the demand as to absorb a large proportion of this amount in the normal channels of trade.

Since the discovery of America in 1492, the production of silver as compared to gold has been 13.925 ounces of silver for each ounce of gold. For reasons I have shown, the supply of silver is not elastic and an increase in price carries no threat of large increased production.

REMONETIZATION AND STABILIZATION OF SILVER WITHOUT DISTURBING GOLD STANDARD

Statement by Hon. KEY PITTMAN, United States Senator from Nevada, before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of the House of Representatives on Feb. 2, 1933

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor and pleasure to be before your committee upon your invitation, to discuss legislation touching the world silver problem.

The traditions, habits, and conceptions of peoples developed throughout the ages cannot be changed—except possibly through long periods of evolution—by legislation. The money and the currencies based thereon of all civilized nations is now, and, since money has been used has been, gold and silver. Gold and silver were first used as an aid to and instrumentality in barter and trade. The ancient farmer discovered that a piece of silver of a certain size offered him in payment for a cow would be accepted in exchange for a horse. So the farmer accepted the piece of silver.

Laws did not make money of gold and silver. They were money before monetary laws were ever enacted. Laws were but declaratory for and served to fix the metal contents of coins for convenience in trade and the payment of debts. Gold and silver, whether in the form of bullion or coin, are and for ages have been accepted in exchange for goods throughout the world. There are sound reasons why such metals were accepted as mediums of exchange. These metals were found substantially everywhere, yet in all places they were scarce. Their production, while slow, was continuous and uniform. The ratio of the production of such metals was not only uniform but substantially certain. Since the beginning of time, as far as information can be obtained, there has not been produced throughout the world on the average more than 15 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold. During 1932 there were less than 13 ounces of silver produced to 1 ounce of gold throughout the world. This uniformity of production and ratio facilitated the use of both metals in trade and in the exchange of such metals. There was a natural ratio between such metals based upon equal demand and relative supply. Laws did not make gold and silver money, but laws decrease the demand for silver through restricting its use as money. This, of course, decreases its relative value. What I seek is first to remove or neutralize these restrictions so as to restore the normal law of supply and demand.

In the last 15 years the price of silver has fluctuated from $1.39 an ounce to 25 cents an ounce. The question naturally is asked, Why restore silver money to its fullest use and former exchange value with gold and prevent such wide fluctuations? The reasons that actuate me are these, namely:

1. Gold or silver is the measure of value of the currencies of all civilized governments whether those metals be in possession or in expectancy.

2. There are only about 12½ billion dollars' worth of monetary gold known to be in existence. It is estimated that there is three times this amount of currency outstanding resting on and redeemable by this gold base. This is exclusive of the bonds, notes, contracts, and all other obligations payable in gold, which amount to many times this figure. It is generally admitted that the monetary stock of gold is now, or will in the reasonably near future, be insufficient as a base for the world's monetary requirements. This burden upon gold is accentuated by lack of confidence in ability to redeem gold currencies and obligations and the knowledge of the maldistribution of gold, and the requirements of the payment of international war debts in gold, and incidentally hoarding of gold by governments and individuals.

3. There are only approximately 11,000,000,000 ounces of silver available in the world for monetary purposes. Of this conservative estimate of 11,000,000,000 ounces probably 7,000,000,000 are permanently locked up in the hordes of India and China. If all this silver were used as a base for silver currencies and as a supplement for currencies based upon gold, whether used in international trade or exclusively for domestic purposes, it could not possibly increase the basic money of the world over $12,000,000,000 even if the parity of such basic silver money were restored to a parity with gold based upon the relative production of gold and silver.

4. It is now, and for ages has been, the measure of values and the wealth reserve of over half of the people of the world.

5. The depreciation in the value of silver has pro tanto depreciated the value of the money of silver-using countries in the exchange of their money for gold-standard moneys for the purchase of products in gold-standard countries.

6. This depreciation with regard to the money of silver-using countries has had the same effect upon our trade and commerce as with countries formerly on the gold standard that have gone off the gold standard and now have a depreciated currency as measured by gold.

7. We understand this effect upon our foreign trade with countries formerly on the gold-standard basis. The same condition now exists, and has existed since 1928, relative to our trade with countries whose ultimate purchasers pay for our products in silver.

8. Depreciated currencies—and I mean depreciated currencies in international trade, because it is only there that it is measured by the gold standard—have raised a wall against our exports and proportionately reduced our tariff protection against such countries of depreciated currency to substantially the amount of depreciation.

9. We are becoming isolated from world trade. Our surpluses are thrown on the domestic market, creating oversupply and a constant depreciation of commodity prices. This result is destructive not only of our foreign and domestic market but the maintenance of stable governments in silver-money-using countries. It forces their people to an industrialization destructive of our market for manufactured products in such countries. In substantiation of this statement, I call attention to the records of our Department of Commerce and reports of our officials.

10. The depreciation of the capacity of silver-money-using peoples to purchase our goods, produced and sold on the higher gold standard, has almost extinguished some of our greatest potential markets.

11. We are forced to the alternative of lowering our money measure of values or of raising the money measure of values of our foreign customers.

12. The destruction of the monetary value of silver in international trade will tend to force all countries ultimately upon the gold standard, and thus place a greater strain upon gold as the monetary base.

I have outlined—hastily, I must admit—some of the reasons that impel me to seek the remonetization or at least the restoration and stabilization of the value of silver. This determination is not new on my part. I have been working to this end 2 or 3 years. The action of the United States Senate convinces me that it agrees with such necessity whether it agrees with the means suggested or not.

In February 1931, the United States Senate adopted uanimously a resolution introduced by me requesting the President to call an international conference for the purpose of the removal of restrictions to a higher use of silver as money. The Chief Executive did not call such a conference.

I sought, then, to accomplish something by the action of our own Government. I introduced in the Senate a bill, the substance of which is now under consideration by your committee, in the form of a bill introduced in the House by Congressman McKEOWN, of Oklahoma, and referred to your committee, directing the Treasury Department to accept tenders of silver produced in the United States and to pay therefor in silver certificates to be issued by our Government at the market price of silver, such price to be determined by the Treasury Department as of the date of tender. From the silver so purchased a standard silver dollar is to be coined, to be held in the Treasury for the redemption of each dollar silver certificate issued for the purchase of such silver.

There would, of course, be a surplus of bullion remaining in the Treasury. At the present market price the Treasury Department would purchase nearly 4 ounces of silver for a $1 silver certificate. As it only requires about seventy-eight one-hundredths of an ounce of silver to manufacture a silver dollar, there would remain a surplus of approximately 3.22 ounces of such silver in the Treasury in addition to such standard silver dollar so purchased by the dollar certificate. This surplus silver is to remain in the Treasury as additional security against any depreciation in the value of the silver certificate. This additional security, in my opinion, is unnecessary, but it satisfies the fear of those who are constantly uneasy with regard to the depreciation of our currencies. There are now in circulation in the United States nearly $500,000,000 in dollar certificates issued under similar laws, and these certificates have not during this century suffered any threat of depreciation.

I must confess that this act will not result in any material expansion in our currency. Such is not the intent of the act. The purpose of the act is to have our Government do something that seems necessary that individuals cannot do. The act will result in the reduction of the world's supply of silver on the market of the world for a period of 5 years. There is an oversupply of silver on the market. This word "oversupply" must be distinguished from "overproduction." There is no overproduction of silver. When I say production I mean mine production. When I say supply I mean silver thrown on the market of the world derived from all sources, including the debasing and melting up of silver coins in various countries.

For instance, in 1929 the world production of silver was 261,511,985 ounces. In 1931 it was 192,709,971 ounces. For 1932, based on estimates, it was approximately 160,000,000 ounces. But the total supply in 1929 was 328,511,985 ounces and in 1931 it was 255,266,700 ounces. The supply over production was derived from the melting up of silver coins in India and the selling of the metal on the markets of the world. This oversupply, coming from an unnatural source, had the natural effect of beating down the price of silver.

There was an even greater effect than in selling this silver, and that was the authority of the secretary of the treasury for India to sell any quantity of such silver at any time and at any price, while at the same time he had a supply on hand of such silver equal to the world's production for approximately 2 years. In other words, in 1928, when India started to sell silver from melted coins, it had approximately 400,000,000 ounces of silver in such form in its treasury. Today, after selling approximately 140,000,000 ounces of such silver, it has around 400,000,000 ounces of silver still available in the treasury for such sale. This is due to accretions in the treasury from general circulation. According to reports from India, such sales are continuing, notwithstanding the abnormal low price of silver. There is no indication that such sales will cease.

It is futile to discuss here the causes that have and now actuate the British Government for India in the initiation and continuance of such policy. The fact is it has been destructive to the exchange value of the silver moneys of such silver-using countries as China, and has destroyed the export trade to all those countries from countries on the gold standard, such as the United States.

The question was and is, What can we do about it? The British industrialists have protested against the policy. It is protested against by the president of the Imperial Bank of India and by the Indian people. These protests have been of no avail.

Sir George Shuster, the Treasurer for India, who seems to have arbitrary powers in the matter, has demanded that silver producers reduce their production. He is still as ignorant of the facts with regard to the production and consumption of silver as he was when he inaugurated the destructive Indian policy. He did not know then—and apparently he does not know now—that 70 percent of the silver production of the world is a by-product in the production of other metals, such as gold, copper, lead, and zinc, and that so long as there is a market for such metals they will be produced, and, of course, silver will be produced as a by-product. He did not know—and he probably does not know now—that the maximum production of silver in the world for all time was only 260,000,000 ounces in a year. He does not know that there was only a normal increase in the consumption of silver, which was accurately measured by the normal increase in production. He does not remember that when, during the war, a crisis arose by reason of the inability of the British Government for India to obtain silver for the redemption of their silver rupee notes that the only available surplus of silver in the world that could be found were the standard silver dollars in the Treasury of the United States, and that we had to take those silver dollars out of the Treasury and supply them to meet such demand. Such ignorance is not subject to criticism, for it is general, nor are my statements intended as a criticism.

A majority of our economists and financiers hold to the myth that silver can be supplied without limit. They know nothing of the statistics of the production and consumption of silver throughout the ages.

I beg you to pardon me, Mr. Chairman, for diverting from my subject. Sir George Shuster has demanded that the producers of silver reduce their production. This cannot be accomplished for the reasons I have stated.

Our Government, however, can take off the market the annual production of the United States for the period of 5 years, as provided in my bill. This will, to a certain extent, comply with the arbitrary demands of Sir George Shuster, and will, to a certain extent, neutralize the oversupply that he insists must be thrown on the market of the world.

Let me explain this: Sir George Shuster desires to sell silver derived from such melted coins—from 30 to 50 million ounces of silver a year. The United States produced in 1932 only 24,000,000 ounces. The most it has ever produced is 61,000,000 ounces. That was during the great peak production of copper, lead, and zinc in this country. The withdrawal of silver from the market of the world through the process of my bill will neutralize, to a certain extent, the oversupply derived from the melting up of Indian coins. If the Governments of Canada and Mexico should follow a similar procedure, then all of the sale from India would be neutralized and the law of supply and demand, based upon mine production and normal purchases, could be maintained and silver would return to the normal price of around 60 cents an ounce.

Now let me cite to you some of the objections made to this bill of mine by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ogden Mills.

In the first place, he contends that if I seek expansion of currency my plan will not result in any material expansion. He is right in that, because it would only take about $6,000,000 in silver certificates to purchase all the silver produced in the United States for 1932.

He doubts whether it would aid the mining industry. It is true that the producer of silver would get no more money for his silver from the Treasury than he would obtain anywhere else in the world, because the market price of silver is the same throughout the world, being fixed by four brokers in London every morning. The miner, however, would be helped by being able to sell to the Government and thus reduce the oversupply of the world, caused by the action of the British Government for India; and, of course, the neutralization of the silver supply would tend to restore silver to its normal price of between 60 and 65 cents an ounce. In that manner the silver producer would be benefited. That, however, is a small part of the benefits to be derived from the act. What I seek is to restore the purchasing power of the depreciated currencies of China and other silver-using countries, as all of us seek to restore the normal value of the depreciated currencies of those countries that have gone off the gold standard. This will help in the purchase of the world's surplus production, thus lifting it off the world's domestic markets and thereby increasing commodity and property prices, which, in my opinion, is the essential thing to the return of universal prosperity.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his correspondence with me, contends that silver is only a commodity and that there is no more reason why the Government should buy silver than it should buy any other commodity. He forgets that silver is not as much a commodity as gold. He forgets that four fifths of the silver now being produced, and that ever has been produced, has been used for monetary purposes, while only half of the gold ever produced has been used for monetary purposes. He forgets that over half the people of the world use silver as money in their own countries, and that they cannot use it as money in exchange for our money, with which to buy our products, because we value gold so high and silver so low. He suggests that the time might come when there would be an overbalancing of silver currencies as against currencies based on gold.

No one expects there will be much increase in the silver production of the United States in the next few years. It is now 24,000,000 ounces annually. Its maximum was 60,000,000 ounces. The purchases only exist for 5 years. If the average during that period was 45,000,000 ounces per annum, it would only mean 225,000,000 ounces. At the present price of silver it would be less than $60,000,000 in silver certificate issues. Even with this issue added to our present issue of silver in silver certificates, the proportion of silver issues as against gold issues in our country would be far less than they were in 1913.

The question is, Why do I support this bill, which has negligible power for currency expansion, against other silver bills which have greater power of currency expansion?

The first reason is that I am directly interested in obtaining a market for the surplus production of our country through the restoration of our export trade.

The second reason is that there may be other methods of expansion within our present monetary system, and the third reason is that my bill is the only bill of the many introduced in the United States Senate that has received a favorable report from any committee.

I realize that there are two principles involved in legislation. One of them is to take nothing less than what you think is right, and the other is to compromise upon the best you can obtain if it constitutes an advance. My bill, in my opinion—and I am only using my judgment as a legislator—is the most that can be obtained through congressional legislation in the near future, and certainly we are faced with an emergency that requires expeditious action. Other advances may be made in the future, but I doubt if any further advance can be made at the present. I have voted against more far-reaching silver measures because I knew that the advocacy of such measures was futile—yes; even more than futile. It would confuse the minds of legislators and arouse the suspicion of an intent to attack our present gold-standard monetary system.

I have no intention of undermining, weakening, or destroying our present gold-standard monetary system. I do not think that it is at all necessary to the remonetization, the restoration to parity with gold, and the stabilization of silver prices. Gold today measures the international value of every currency in the world, whether it be the pound sterling or the Chinese dollar. I am speaking of the value of money in the purchase of goods in other countries. The Chinese dollar has a par value in China and in purchasing goods in the United States it has only a value of 20 cents. Gold is accepted throughout the world today as the measure of the value of money in international trade. It has existed for 60 years at least. It would be difficult to change it by legislation. Nothing would be accomplished by changing it through legislation.

What we seek is to have other measures of value conform to the gold measure. That is what we have done and are now doing in the United States. We have more silver in circulation in the United States and silver currency than any other country of the world outside of China and India. One twelfth of our currency is silver currency. Our dollar is worth $1.29 an ounce in gold. The same size silver dollar in China is worth 20 cents in our gold. There is only approximately 20 cents' worth of silver in our silver dollar, measured by the market price of silver, and yet 10 of our standard silver dollars readily exchange for $10 in gold, which makes the price of the silver in the silver dollar $1.29 an ounce. If every great commercial country in the world had the same system, there would be no question about the parity of silver with gold, and that would be on the natural parity of 16 to 1. In that event the Chinese would not have to pay $3,000 for an automobile through the process of exchanging their money for gold, but would exchange their silver dollar for a dollar of our gold, and would only have to pay $600 for an automobile.

I came here at your invitation to discuss the reasons for my bill. I beg your pardon for having diverged onto the general silver problem. I am not here to oppose any other bill that has been introduced. I seek only that which may possibly become law without delay.

I am satisfied that purchasing power must be increased, not only in our own country but throughout the world, before prosperity can possibly return. I do not believe that purchasing power can be increased until a larger quantity of sound money can be made available for those who must purchase money with goods and property. I do not claim that the expansion of available money through the restoration of the purchasing power of silver is a panacea for all of our ills. I am convinced, however, after a long study of the situation that such restoration would instantly increase purchases in our country, reduce our surplus of production, and thus increase our purchasing power, increase the capacity of our manufacturing institutions and the employment of our laborers. I cannot content myself with the policy now indulged in by some of our statesmen that the only remedy is liquidation, liquidation, further and further liquidation.

I have no confidence in the theory that the depression has flattened out. I admit that it has been retarded. This frequently happens just before death. I admit that our airplane of finance spiraled too rapidly up into the stratosphere. We all know that it has been in a tail-spin, rapidly and dangerously approaching earth. The pilot may have gained some control, he may have flattened it out to some extent, but we know that the earth is close and that a crash will bring destruction and conflagration. It may be flattened out, but what obstacles are ahead of us in the fog we do not know. Isn't it time to pull back on the controls and elevate our financial plane so that it may assuredly and safely rise above all obstructions.

I ask leave to file with your committee as a part of my remarks the report of the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate, in which it approved my silver purchase act, which in identical form is now under consideration by your committee as introduced by Congressman McKEOWN, of Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So Mr. WHEELER'S amendment, in the nature of a substitute for Mr. LONG'S amendment, was rejected.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, the farm relief bill under discussion presents a program so involved and so speculative that I am constrained to urge this body to be reasonably certain that good is to come out of it before giving the bill approval. The Senate is fully informed as to the tragic conditions prevailing, both as to agriculture and the wage earners. Such conditions direct this body to minimize the elements of doubt in this bill, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the inclusion in the measure of such reserve provisions as may some day be necessary for provident use against a calamitous situation.

Out of the hundred and one problems involved, I desire to address myself to just a few matters which are, to me, of much importance.

First. Reserve provisions.

Second. Acreage economy.

Third. Administration expense.

1. RESERVE PROVISIONS

Any important business has long since learned the necessity for creating and setting up provident reserves against unforeseen disaster. The same providence should be employed, as far as possible, in designing the gigantic plan now before us.

Speaking for wheat producers, I call your attention to the possibility of either an unbearable surplus of wheat or a serious shortage thereof. A huge surplus of wheat inevitably decreases the world price thereof and, in consequence, increases the tax rate per bushel which must be assessed to meet the promised result expected under this bill.

We should provide for disposition of our excessive surplus wheat on the world's market. That surplus would be encouraged by the use of the provision for paying the cost of production plus a reasonable profit for the portion used in domestic consumption. With the present program for national economy in the natural and former importing wheat countries, and which countries have created all sorts of artifices against importations of wheat, it must be apparent to a casual student of the question that our only hope for reacquiring a position enabling the exportation of our wheat depends upon a mutually satisfactory exchange of goods between a foreign nation and our own country. I commend to the attention of the chairman of the Agricultural Committee the responsibility of a further provision in this bill which would make it possible for those who are to bear the responsibility of administration to deal with an excessive and burdensome surplus of wheat. I suggest that it may be desirable—and I advocate it—that the Secretary of Agriculture may find it a reserve road against an otherwise calamitous situation if he may engage in a system of quotas, sharing with other exporting countries a reasonable share of the world's wheat market.

The unknown future may one day find us short of wheat supplies. Reserve legislation to protect the Nation against such a catastrophe is also commended to the attention of our chairman in charge of this bill. For the price and maintenance of two battleships, we could buy, warehouse, and preserve in dead storage such an amount of sound, storable, hard wheat as would not only protect food stores, on the one hand, but, further and important, the long-time program of impounding such wheat would remove such a weight from the present world's stock as to immediately upon the effectuation thereof be the cause of a substantial enhancement of the world price thereof.

Two hundred million bushels of wheat stored under such a declared policy and program would not cost as much money as may be imagined. Dead storage in the primary markets would be the cheapest storage built. Cheap labor, low taxes, cheap insurance, only watchman expense, would not exceed 2 cents per bushel per year, $4,000,000. The cost of dead storage for buildings and equipment suitable for the next 40 years would not exceed a capital cost of 5 cents per bushel; on 200,000,000 bushels this would be $10,000,000. The investment in wheat at the primary market would be at present prices about 35 cents per bushel, or $70,000,000. The enhancement of the price of wheat would be substantial and immediate, without all the roundhouse methods and admittedly costly program which is about to be adopted.

The cost of this character of undertaking would fall on the taxpayers who pay into the Federal Treasury—the same people who are paying the old $300,000,000 charity bill and are about to pay the new $500,000,000 charity bill. I urge the Senate to sanely and deliberately consider the wisdom of legislation in contemplation of reserve against depleted wheat stocks and the crushing burden of excess wheat stocks which may be frozen in the primary markets for lack of any outlet from our shores.

Practically all our world market for durum wheat used for macaroni and spaghetti is to be found in Italy. That market has been lost during the depression. It must be regained or 5,000,000 acres in the Red River Valley in the spring-wheat area will find its way into other production.

2. ACREAGE ECONOMY

Why flax has not been included in this bill is a wonder to me. Normally, we produce 20,000,000 bushels and consume 40,000,000 bushels, the other 20,000,000 being imported from Argentina. The Nation is in need of more linseed oil—paint—today than could be furnished by farmers through flax production for the next 5 years. Why is flax not included in this bill? It should be. When and if normal times return, the American farmer should have the benefit of the market in his own country, and not the farmers of Argentina. The importation of 20,000,000 bushels of flax approximates, in terms of acres, about 3,000,000. A loss of 3,000,000 acres to the Northwest farmers is not acreage economy—in light of a program, presently before us, which contemplates leasing wheatland to lie fallow. That is a legislative paradox.

We must preserve our markets for the durum-wheat exports and against the flax imports, which approximates in acres about 5,000,000 and 3,000,000, respectively, or 8,000,000 farm acres.

3. ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSE

This will, of course, cost money. The largest trained force available for carrying out the provisions in this bill is the county agents, directed by the Extension Service in the various States. By training, experience, understanding, geographic, and personal relationships they are preeminently qualified and readily available for service in this program. Contrast their use with a nondescript method of hunting help, to say nothing of the patronage phase of selection.

Another legislative paradox would be created if we pass this bill, on the one hand, and discontinue Federal aid to the States for support of the extension departments and the county agents, on the other hand. I am informed that the Director of the Budget contemplates beheading all county agents, and that is why I direct attention to a probable legislative paradox or abortive economy.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have here a short statement upon the silver question, more or less pertinent to the discussion today. This statement I prepared several months ago. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is axiomatic that the volume of primary money in circulation influences, if it does not determine, the price of commodities. Mother earth has yielded for thousands of years gold and silver at substantially the same ratio from 12 to 15 to 1; that is, during this long period, when 12 to 15 ounces of silver were produced 1 ounce of gold was dug from the earth.

This ratio of production stabilized the values of these metals and they circulated throughout the world as primary money and interchangeable upon a parity fixed by their production and validated by custom or by law or both.

Gold and silver were recognized by the United States as the money of this country, and, circulating side by side, interchangeably, they supplied the monetary needs of people, stimulated industry, and brought prosperity. During the last century financial interests in various countries conspired to destroy silver as a money, thus diminishing the amount of primary money and, of course, the volume of circulating medium. Gold has appreciated in value measured by human toil and the products of labor.

The world depression is in part due to the debasement of silver and the determination to make gold the only measure of value, and the base upon which would be constructed the edifice of world business and credits. The savings of one half of the peoples of the world consist of silver. This effort to destroy silver as money has robbed the people of the Orient of the greater part of the value of long years of savings. The purchasing power of a billion of people in the Orient has been reduced almost to the vanishing point. India and China, if the value of silver measured by gold had not been almost destroyed, would have been purchasing billions of dollars' worth of commodities from the United States and European nations. Their standard of living would have been advanced and their purchases of products from the United States and occidental nations would have annually materially increased. India would have been buying cotton goods from Great Britain and Great Britain would have been purchasing larger quantities of cotton from the United States.

The cotton growers of the Southern States have lost billions of dollars in the decline of cotton and in the reduced purchases of cotton by English manufacturers. With silver reduced to 24 cents an ounce, China's purchasing power has been reduced more than three fourths. China, India, Mexico, and several South American countries are struggling for their economic life, and their deplorable economic condition reduced American exports to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars annually, and directly and indirectly reduces the price of American commodities, the wages of American labor, and contributes to the unemployment situation and the frightful economic depression now afflicting the United States.

With the stabilization of silver and its restoration to a proper place in the monetary system of the world, peace would come to China, and hundreds of millions of Chinese would be ready to purchase American products of the value of hundreds of millions of dollars annually. This would mean, of course, that American mills and factories would increase their output, American farmers would find additional markets for their surplus products, and hundreds of thousands of unemployed American citizens would find employment.

With silver restored, Canada would increase her purchases of American products, and that would mean larger American production, with more jobs for the unemployed. Mexico's mines which are now closed would open, hundreds of thousands of Mexicans would find employment, and Mexico's imports from the United States, which have shrunk almost to the vanishing point, would be increased to the extent of several hundreds of millions of dollars. Of course, this would mean that more American goods and commodities would be produced, which would require larger capital investment, greater consumption of American raw materials, and the employment of a larger number of American workmen.

With silver restored, hundreds of American mines now closed down would be reopened, smelters and mills that are not operating would soon be functioning, and hundreds of thousands of men would be employed in the mining industry. With their employment the demand for steel and iron in mills and mines and smelters would be increased. This would mean thousands of men now idle would find employment. It would also mean that more iron ore would be required, and boats upon the Great Lakes and railroad cars would be required for transportation of the ores from the mines to the plants. With the opening of mines, mills, and smelters, the demand for lumber would be imperative, and tens of millions of dollars annually would be expended to purchase timber supplies; forests which are now silent would resound with the woodman's ax, and sawmills now idle would furnish work to unemployed Americans. Our railroads, which show such a sharp decline in transportation, resulting in the discharge of tens of thousands of employees, would be compelled to multiply their trains and varied activities, which would result in the employment of many thousands of persons who have been separated from the service. In my opinion the silver question is one of major importance, and its proper solution will contribute more to solve the unemployment problem and to bring back prosperity than any scheme or plan that has been suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Would a substitute for the Long amendment be in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I present an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana:

On page 43, after line 5, insert:

"PART 6—FINANCING—AND EXERCISING POWER CONFERRED BY SECTION 8 OF ARTICLE I OF THE CONSTITUTION: TO COIN MONEY AND TO REGULATE THE VALUE THEREOF

"SEC. 34. Pursuant to the policy stated in this act, and for the purposes of raising commodity prices, meeting the existing deficit in the Federal Treasury and expenses of maturing obligations and the expenses of the Federal Government, the President is hereby authorized, within his discretion, to do either or all of the following mentioned acts:

"(a) To cause to be issued, in such amount or amounts as he may from time to time order, United States notes, as provided in the act entitled 'An act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption of funding thereof and for funding the floating debt of the United States', approved February 25, 1862, and acts supplementary thereto, and amendatory thereof, in the same size, and of suitable color, as the Federal Reserve notes heretofore issued, and in denominations of $1, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, $1,000, and $10,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, with the approval of the President, issue such notes in meeting all forms of current and maturing Federal obligations, and in addition may buy United States bonds and other interest-bearing obligations of the United States in such amounts per week as may be approved by the President.

"(b) By proclamation the President may fix the ratio of the proportional value of silver to gold in all coins which are by law current as money within the United States according to quantity in weight of pure silver or pure gold: Provided, That after the issuance of such proclamation there shall be free coinage of both gold and silver, at the ratio fixed as provided herein, subject to the conditions and limitations now provided by law with respect to the coinage of gold; and all the laws of the United States relating to such coinage or to recoinage, exchange, or conversion of coin, bars, or bullion of gold, shall apply equally, so far as practicable, to silver: And provided further, That the dollar, consisting of the number of grains of gold nine-tenths fine fixed as provided herein and/or of the number of grains of silver nine-tenths fine fixed as provided herein, shall be the standard unit of value and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard: And provided further, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity between gold and silver and between all money issued or coined and the standard unit of value.

"(c) By proclamation the President may fix the weight of the gold dollar in grains nine-tenths fine, and in the event of the free coinage of silver, as provided in paragraph (b) hereof, may fix the weight of the silver dollar in grains nine tenths fine, and by such proclamation such gold dollar, and in the event of the free coinage of silver such silver dollar, with weights so fixed and maintained at a parity, one with the other, as provided in said paragraph (b), shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity with this standard and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity.

"(d) By proclamation the President may create a Dollar Stabilization Board whose duty it shall be to regulate, stabilize, and maintain as nearly as practicable the stabilized purchasing power of the dollar: Provided, That such Board shall be composed of 5 members and shall embrace the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the Comptroller of the Currency, and 2 additional members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"SEC. 35. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to make and promulgate rules and regulations covering any action taken or to be taken by the President, respecting either paragraph (a), (b), (c), or (d), of this title.

"SEC. 36. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum or sums as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this title."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I desire to state that hearings were held upon the pending bill. Practically every witness who appeared before the committee testified that, in his opinion, no substantial relief could be provided for the farmer unless and until the money question should be considered and adjusted.

In the report upon this bill the committee, by a vote of 16 to 0, went on record in favor of some form of monetary expansion.

At this time I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD a copy of that portion of the report upon this bill dealing with the money question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The committee also directed that there be placed in this report a statement as to the necessity of an expansion of the currency and the absolute necessity for an increase in commodity prices. The statement as prepared and adopted by the committee is attached hereto, as follows:

DEFLATION MUST BE CHECKED

"The policy of deflation of commodity prices and farm values inaugurated in 1920 still persists. The first groups to feel the effects of this policy were farmers and stockmen. Thereafter in turn merchants, factories, wage earners, and now railroads; life-insurance companies and banks are tottering, and unless the foundation of prosperity—agriculture—is repaired all must fall.

"In reporting this bill favorably we feel that we should advise the Senate that, in our opinion, the bill will not alone afford the relief which the farmer must have to enable him to survive economically.

"If we concede that the bill reported will bring about all the benefits claimed—agricultural price parity with other commodities—yet we are forced to the conclusion that such limited relief will not enable the farmers to meet their fixed charges, such as taxes, interest, debts, and necessary expenses.

"Experts, students of the trend of developments and influences, are practically agreed that the deflation process is resumed after the recent bank holiday.

"Prior to the bank holiday some 12,000 banks failed, resulting in the destruction of some 20 billions of bank credit or deposit money. With the ending of the holiday additional thousands of banks failed to open, resulting in the temporary if not permanent destruction of additional billions of what we call and use for money.

"Such holiday resulted in the further withdrawal from circulation of all gold and gold certificates.

"During the past 3 weeks the Federal Reserve System has disposed of bills and United States Government securities in the total sum of over $1,000,000,000; reserve bank credit has been contracted in a sum of $956,000,000, and the money in circulation has been deflated in the total sum of $1,185,000,000.

"We report these facts and state that no substantial relief is possible for agriculture until the policy of deflation is not only checked but reversed and a substantial sum of actual money is admitted and, if need be, forced into circulation.

"We report that it is not sufficient to have an ample supply of currency in the vaults of the Federal Reserve banks, and that it is not even sufficient to have an ample supply of currency in the vaults of the National, State, and private banks of the country.

"With some 25 billions of bank credit—deposit money—canceled and destroyed, and with the remainder frozen and unobtainable; with much of the actual currency outside the Treasury hoarded and inactive; with over 40 nations of the world enjoying a lower production cost than the United States by reason of their depreciated currencies, the people, without either money or credit, are stopped, business is at a standstill, and deflation not only continues but is accentuated.

ONE-HUNDRED-CENT DOLLAR DEMAND

"The Federal Reserve System, created to serve and promote the best interests of the people, commerce, and industry, while pretending to be trying to keep sufficient money and credit available, has failed. Some 10 other Federal agencies have been created to assist in making Federal credit available to those needing and demanding assistance.

"We report that with our present restricted volume of bank credit and with a like restriction of actual money in practical circulation—owing to hoarding—we recommend that existing policies of selling bills, United States securities, and deflating the currency and credit be reversed and that a sufficient volume of money be placed in circulation to replace the currency hoarded and to supplement the bank credit or deposit money now frozen in the banks of the country.

DOLLAR MUST BE STABILIZED

"Agriculture demands an adequate supply of honest and sound money and reports that at this time we have neither.

"Agriculture does not demand a 50-cent dollar or an unsound dollar but does protest the retention of a 200-cent dollar. A dollar which fluctuates in purchasing power from 50 cents in 1920 to 200 cents in 1933 is neither a sound nor an honest dollar. Dollars so scarce as to be obscure, thereby forcing into existence systems of barter, trade, and scrip, are not adequate.

"Agriculture demands that the farmer should have a 100-cent dollar; that the purchasing power of the dollar should be fixed and established at that point to serve the best interests of the people, trade, commerce, and industry, and that when such value is once fixed it should be stabilized at such value.

"We report further that no just, substantial, reliable, or permanent relief can be provided agriculture or any other industry until the money question is considered and adjusted."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 17, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Thou who art our all-glorious, Heavenly Father, be merciful to accept the poverty of our gratitude. We pray that the spirit of our divine Teacher may purge out the leaven of envy, of jealousy and selfishness, that we may all be brought together in common sympathy, in common desire for the common welfare of our country. As we walk in the midst of care and labor, give us a sense of Thy overruling sovereignty and of that life that is above this life. Let our thoughts and feelings carry no pain, but joy, well-wishing, and good will. Father in Heaven, look graciously upon all classes and conditions of men. May our hands be open and our hearts warm to encourage and succor those who are in need and in misfortune. In the name of the world's Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 14, 1933, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 158. An act to prevent interstate commerce in certain commodities and articles produced or manufactured in industrial activities in which persons are employed more than 5 days per week or 6 hours per day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from Edwin A. Halsey, the Secretary of the Senate, transmitting a copy of the answer of United States District Judge Harold Louderback to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, which was referred to the managers on the part of the House conducting the impeachment proceedings:

I, Edwin A. Halsey, Secretary of the Senate of the United States of America, certify that the Senate, sitting for the trial of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, upon articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, did on April 11, 1933, adopt an order, of which the following is a full, true, correct, and compared copy:

"Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of Harold Louderback, judge of the United States district court in and for the northern district of California, to the articles of impeachment, and also a copy of the foregoing order."

I do hereby further certify that the document hereto attached, consisting of 38 sheets, is a photostatic copy of the answer of said Harold Louderback to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, presented by said Harold Louderback to the Senate, sitting as Court of Impeachment, on April 11, 1933.

In testimony whereof, I hereunto subscribe my name and affix the seal of the Senate of the United States of America this 12th day of April A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] EDWIN A. HALSEY,

THE TAXING OF CRUDE OIL

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a very brief statement on the oil situation by a distinguished citizen of my State.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and do so only for the purpose of obtaining the floor for a moment to ask the majority floor leader if he cannot tell the House where the direct relief bill is and when it may come out.

Mr. BYRNS. The direct relief bill is under consideration by the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am sorry I cannot give the gentleman any definite information as to when it will be reported. The chairman of this committee is here. I shall ask him to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. STEAGALL. In deference to the wishes of some of the members of the committee we have conducted short hearings on this bill. We hope to finish the hearings, and probably finish the bill tomorrow.

Mr. KVALE. Of course, the gentleman is fully aware of the desperate need there is in many sections of the country.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. And he is anxious to expedite this legislation.

Mr. STEAGALL. Certainly.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection and apologize to the gentleman from Arkansas for the delay.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Arkansas if it was his own remarks he wished to extend?

Mr. PARKS. I made the statement that I wished to extend my remarks by including about 20 lines of a statement of a distinguished citizen of my State on the question of oil taxation.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement by Judge George M. LeCroy, of El Dorado, Ark., on the Taxing of Crude Oil.

Judge LeCroy is a profound lawyer and an able judge. For many years he has been judge of the second division of the seventh chancery district of Arkansas. In the past 10 years he has heard thousands of cases involving every conceivable question pertaining to oil and oil production; he has been a student of taxation, and while he is an independent producer he has made a careful survey of the entire field of oil production, and I think this statement is worthy of being printed in the RECORD for the benefit of all who are interested in this subject.

The statement follows:

EL DORADO, ARK., April 14.—There is offered with the discovery of each big oil field a technical, new plan of rules and regulations controlling flush production, which nobody can understand or knows anything about and which is usually discussed and litigated until the oil is gone. The truth of it is that purchasers of crude oil have never paid very much for flush production in any oil field, neither are they going to until a plain common-sense solution or regulation is arrived at, and we suggest the following:

Let our Federal Government levy a production and import tax of $1 per barrel on every barrel of oil produced in the United States or imported; then exempt from this tax the first 100 barrels per day produced from each and every well in the United States.

This will solve the problem; it will put them all alike to looking for tax-free oil; it will put the internal revenue department to checking for its taxes, and we will have no more hot oil; it will put the whole industry on a firm, substantial basis, and the country will go forward with a program of exploitation and development; it will cause our little stripper wells to be reclaimed and operated at full capacity; it will put the idle and unemployed of the oil industry to work at once, and with such a program we can go forward and make some money.

THE WAY TO CARRY THE NEW DEAL HOME

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including a radio address I delivered Saturday night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address I delivered over the radio on the Way of Carry the New Deal Home, under the auspices of the American Taxpayers League, from the studio of the National Broadcasting Co., Washington, D.C., Saturday night, April 15, at 7 o'clock.

The address is as follows:

When I was a small boy my mother talked and read to me a great deal. Most of her talks were about the great fundamentals of life, but in simple language that I could understand. I remember one evening she told me about the law of retribution. No, she didn't call it by that name; she called it the law of "in return", and I understood that. She gave me several simple examples so this fundamental law would register upon my young and immature mind. I remember she told me, among other things, that if I treated my playmates in the right way they "in return" would treat me in the right way; that if I were good to people they "in return" would be good to me; that if I led a clean life God "in return" would give me a clean mind and body. And she told me that this law was just another way of stating the proposition that we reap what we sow.

I have been thinking a great deal lately about what my mother told me, and I am wondering tonight if what is wrong with the American taxpayer today is not the fact that the law of "in return" has set in to work.

Do not think for one moment that the law of retribution, or, as my mother was wont to call it, the law of "in return", does not apply to governments but is just a moral law that brings punishment for some spiritual delinquency. It is the law of State as well as church. It applies to our social system, to our economic system, to our business system, and to governments, national, State, county, and municipal. It is recorded, you will remember, that in the days of long ago it applied to the prodigal, to the business men to whom the Master intrusted the investment of the talents, and, likewise, to the governments of Sodom and Gomorrah.

And do not think that I am trying to preach to you. I am not. I am only a grown-up country boy who was reared by a godly old-fashioned country mother, and who still believes in her philosophy of life. The trouble with some of us is that we look upon religion as some fantastic, idealistic, intangible kind of thing that is good for the old and sick and the women and children. Well, get this: Religion is good, hard, common sense, and is good for men—red-blooded men, tax-paying men, office-holding men—and is also good for governments. The man who thinks he can run his own life, his business, or this Government any other way except in accordance with the principles of Christianity will wake up some day and find out that it can't be done.

We have been trying it, and let me give you, purely from the standpoint of the taxpayer, a few of the results:

Twenty years ago $1 out of every $15.50 earned went to the support of the Government. Do you realize the toll governments took last year? Why, last year $1 out of every $3 earned went to the support of the governments.

Twenty years ago the cost of the Federal Government was around $750,000,000. Last year the cost of the Federal Government was around $5,000,000,000.

Twenty years ago the cost of State and local governments was around $1,250,000,000. Last year the cost of State and local governments was around $10,000,000,000.

Twenty years ago the cost of the Federal Government was around $10 per person. Well, what did it cost last year? Around $40 for every man, woman, child, and baby in America.

Twenty years ago the cost of State and local governments was around $38 per person. Well, what did it cost last year? Around $80 per person.

Twenty years ago the Federal indebtedness was $1,028,564,055. Today the Federal indebtedness is $21,362,464,177.

Twenty years ago the State and local indebtedness was $3,196,300,000. Today the State and local indebtedness is around $15,000,000,000.

Twenty years ago farm taxes were $278,000,000. Last year farm taxes amounted to $629,000,000.

And, Mr. Farmer, get this: The expenses of the Federal Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, were practically as much as the value of all farm products. When I say farm products I mean exactly what I say—all your grain, hay, livestock, poultry, and dairy products.

We have, indeed, come to a sad pass when it takes all the farmers produce—get that—produce and not earn—in a year to run the Federal Government for a year. Do you realize what that means? Listen: It means that one fourth of our population—because the farmers and their families comprise over one fourth of our population—is working from 10 to 14 hours per day producing grain of all kinds, livestock of all kinds, poultry of all kinds, and dairy products of all kinds, and selling same in order to realize enough money to support the Federal Government alone.

I only wish I had time to give you a few more results.

When I get through talking I want you to sit right where you are and answer for yourselves if the sad estate to which we have fallen is not—

"In return" for surrendering powers that should ever remain in the people to some centralized governmental agency?

"In return" for electing to office those who put self above the common good and for permitting the influence of selfish interests to dominate our policies of State?

"In return" for running our governments on borrowed money?

"In return" for the indifference we show to the God-given right of suffrage?

Well, you ask me, What are you going to do about it? Let me tell you, Mr. Taxpayer, this Government belongs to you—get that—and if it is not being run in the right way it is your fault—get that, too. How about running our governments, Federal, State, county, and municipal, in such a way that the law of "in return" will work in our favor, reducing the tax rate, instead of against us, increasing the tax rate? How about putting more common sense and less bureaus and commissions into our governmental set-ups? How about putting more ordinary honest minds and fewer master minds in positions of power and trust? How about holding down governmental expenditures to governmental receipts so buckle and tongue will meet at the end of each fiscal year? How about qualifying yourself to vote and then protecting your interest by taking an active part in affairs of state?

Oh, let me tell you how to carry the new deal home. Here is my prescription:

(1) Quit surrendering powers that should ever remain in the people to some governmental agency over which the people have no control and about which the people know very little if anything. There can be no such thing as a centralized democracy. The most costly and dangerous thing a democracy can do is to centralize power. This centralization of power accounts for our overlapping, inefficient, and useless departments, bureaus, and commissions, of which there are over 200 here in Washington within the 13 major branches of the Federal Government; and do not think that the Federal Government is the only government afflicted with these useless departments, bureaus, and commissions, because most of the State, county, and municipal governments are honeycombed with them. A good way to reduce your taxes—Federal, State, county, and municipal—is to reduce your departments, bureaus, and commissions, and bring the governments back to the people to be administered by their chosen representatives.

(2) Quit electing just anyone to office. Be careful in electing men to man your governments. If you want a clean, efficient, and frugal government, elect clean, efficient, and frugal men. And in electing your officials above everything else put honest minds above master minds. The trouble with our country today is the fact it has been afflicted with too many master minds. Sleep on this tonight: I would not give one honest mind for a cow pen full of master minds.

And another thing: Quit permitting selfish interests—interests whose highest conception of patriotism is loyalty to the gang and whose love of country is measured in terms of dollars—to dominate the policies of governments.

(3) Quit running our governments on borrowed money, because pay day will certainly come around. You had just as well try to get rid of sassafras sprouts as to get rid of pay day. Do not get it into your head that it is possible for governments to pay for the extravagances of today out of the taxes of tomorrow. Governments, like individuals, that live beyond their income sooner or later come to grief. In order to have stable governments, governmental budgets must be kept in balance.

(4) And, lastly, quit remaining a governmental slacker. Become not only interested but active in affairs of state. Do you realize, Mr. Taxpayer, that on an average less than 50 percent of our potential voting population actually vote? And yet many taxpayers who do not vote, who take no part, active or inactive, in our elections are complaining of high taxes! Some, you know, think they are too busy to devote a little time to affairs of state. Well, I know that some of the taxpayers are pretty busy and that their time is important, but I know, too, that if they would devote a little time to governmental affairs that they would find that it will pay them big dividends in the way of tax reduction. And then some, you know, are too pure to mix in elections. Poor deluded things! If elections are rotten, it is because the really good men and women are inactive. Let me tell you this: I have no patience with men and women who pretend to be too good to take a part in politics. When people begin to think they are too good to participate in affairs of state they are, in my opinion, already damned or should be knocked in the head before they fall from grace.

Mr. Taxpayer, answer these questions:

If the Government is being run in an extravagant manner, will you lower the tax rate by letting it remain in extravagant hands?

If the Government is being run in an inefficient manner, will you obtain efficiency by letting it remain in inefficient hands?

If the Government is being run in a corrupt manner, will you purify conditions by letting it remain in corrupt hands?

My boy in knee breeches can answer those questions. And yet the taxpayers, indifferent to the ballot, seemingly assume that affairs of government in some miraculous way will right themselves. It is taking the American taxpayer a long time to realize that, under our system of government, if affairs of state are not being administered in the right way it is within their power, through the ballot to bring about the needed corrections and reforms.

Mr. Taxpayer, can you hope to improve conditions unless you actively participate in elections and thus create new conditions?

Qualify yourself to vote and then get on the firing line and stay there. Eternal vigilance is not only the price of liberty, it is the price of a clean government and a low tax rate.

Now, I have given you a pretty long prescription. Let me boil it down so you will remember it. Here it is: Every taxpayer a voter; if you please, a politician, not in the sense of an office-seeker but in the sense that he is interested in a frugal government impartially administered in the interest of all.

Let your slogan be: Every taxpayer a voter.

THE 5-DAY WEEK AND 6-HOUR DAY BILL

Mr. MUSSELWHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the 6-hour day bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUSSELWHITE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to scores of inquiries from all over Michigan as to my stand on the 30-hour week bill introduced by Senator BLACK, permit me to state:

I am not opposed to the principle of the measure, but to the form in which it was presented. It was not, as originally offered, an administration bill, and if it is finally approved with the endorsement of the administration, it will have many modifications that may make it acceptable.

Surprise is expressed that I made reference to the canning industry as an example, in view of Senator VANDENBERG'S amendment to the original bill. My statement was made before this amendment was submitted, with a full knowledge that under its terms the principal agricultural industries—and some others perhaps—of my district would be ruined.

I am in hopes that the measure, with the approval of the administration, will reach the House in some more palatable form; for, as I wish to emphasize, I am in full accord with the principle of the bill. Its application is just something else under present conditions.

I urge critics to withhold censure until they study provisions of the measure if or when it is submitted to the House. So far it is wholly a Senate measure, very drastic in its original form and already subjected to some modifications.

In my judgment, a 30-hour week in industry in interstate commerce under prevailing conditions would merely be another share-the-misery move unless it provided also minimum wages. It would drive pauper labor still lower. It would make American industry one vast sweatshop and drive many decent industries to the wall. It would reduce the mass market to the demand of coolies and the purse of slaves. It is the hard reality to which we are now headed unless wages and purchasing power can be stabilized at an American level, and that quickly.

The 30-hour week in industry will come; it must come. I favor it to the full extent of its practical application. But let us not get hysterical about it. It will inevitably come through the workings of social progress, just as the 8-hour day was adopted—not by legislation, but largely in spite of it.

I have full confidence in the wise leadership of President Roosevelt and am firmly supporting his policies. He can save American industry. I am certain he will. I believe he is preparing to lead Congress in rewriting this 30-hour bill so as to protect industry, protect the worker, protect wages, to create buying power, to control production, and start business forward again.

In such heroic effort President Roosevelt will have the support not only of Congress but of the people.

I opposed, and still oppose, the measure as submitted by Senator BLACK, because it is my firm conviction that in that form it would injure rather than benefit labor.

I will support any measure for a shorter workday and work week that I can satisfy myself is fair to labor and industry. It can be done; it will be. But the Black Senate bill is not the solution.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GAMBRILL] is ill at the Naval Hospital. I ask unanimous consent that he be relieved from attendance until he recovers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] is absent on account of important business. I ask that he be excused until further notice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be allowed to sit during the sessions of the House today and tomorrow.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I hope it is not the intention of the chairman to have the committee sit beyond 5 or half past 5. I do not want any night sessions.

Mr. McSWAIN. I assure the gentleman from Michigan I am just as anxious as he to have supper, and shall cooperate to that extent.

Mr. JAMES. In other words, the gentleman will have no night sessions?

Mr. McSWAIN. The gentleman means night sessions of the committee?

Mr. JAMES. Night sessions of the committee, yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Not tonight, anyway.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to have it understood there will be no night sessions at all.

Mr. McSWAIN. Very well; we will agree to that.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman state when the bill will be reported? What is his desire now?

Mr. McSWAIN. My desire is that the committee authorize me to report the bill not later than tomorrow. That is the reason I have asked only for permission to sit during the sessions of the House today and tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS AND MUNITIONS OF WAR

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. My understanding is that the matter to be taken up first, the unfinished business before the House, is the vote on House Joint Resolution 93, to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States under certain conditions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The previous question has been ordered on the resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. FISH. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is also a member of the committee?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FISH moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs with instructions to that committee to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

At the end of the bill add a new section to be known as section 3 and to read as follows:

"Provided, That nothing in this resolution shall violate or authorize the President to violate the neutrality of the United States."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, on that motion I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. All those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Fifty-four Members have risen, a sufficient number.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the other side.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order you cannot demand the other side at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; the other side can be demanded, because 54 is not necessarily one fifth of the number present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred gentlemen are present, and 54 is a sufficient number to demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 248, answered "present" 1, not voting, 67, as follows:

On motion of Mr. McREYNOLDS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ARMS EMBARGO—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

(Mr. ZIONCHECK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, due to an unavoidable delay, I was unable to be present when the vote was taken on the so-called "embargo bill." Had I been present I would have voted in the negative. Never before has any measure caused me so much difficulty in deciding which way to vote. I have listened to all the speakers on both sides of the question, and, after carefully rereading their arguments in the RECORD, I am convinced that neither side was absolutely frank and open in its discussion.

I am not unmindful of the fact that it was stated that many pacifist organizations came before the Committee on Foreign Affairs advocating the bill's passage and that the opponents of the bill before the committee largely consisted of representatives of munition manufacturers and airplane companies. I must confess that usually I would vote contrary to the wishes and desires of such interests, but, nevertheless, I recognize that even they in their greed for immediate profits might be looking at the matter from a short-sighted standpoint, as they have done so many times in the past.

The particular provision in this bill to which I object is that which allows the President, after cooperating with other governments, to determine which nation is the aggressor of a war then existing and to declare an embargo against the sending of munitions or arms to the aggressor nation. This seems to me to be a rather dangerous interference in foreign troubles and is liable to involve the United States, by reason of such action, in another foreign war. Under the present so-called " pacific reprisal concept " of international law and relationships it is difficult to determine which nation is the aggressor, and it is my understanding that there is an honest difference of opinion at this late date as to which nations were the aggressors in the last World War. It seems to me that it is a matter of betting on a horse race and taking the chances of betting on the wrong horse.

I can understand that many people with idealistic concepts feel that this embargo act is a partial step toward a world peace, but it is my sincere belief that they fail to recognize the impossibility of world cooperation under our competitive scheme of things in anything but warfare. It is my belief that if these people analyze the developments of the last 100 years in particular this truth would become self-evident. They seem to fail to recognize that the causes for present-day wars are prompted by a struggle for world markets and for the protection of foreign investments abroad. There is no one who would like to see world peace more than I, but I am satisfied that this measure will only lead to turmoil, strife, and warfare, no matter how carefully and cautiously it is exercised. I would have no hesitation in voting for this measure if it gave the President power to declare an absolute embargo on the shipment of arms and munitions in the event of a foreign war. That would be a forward step. I would further like to see a measure that would nationalize all industries which make arms and munitions, for such a measure, if passed, would give the President of the United States absolute control over the disposition of the products of these industries.

Until we come to a more equitable and cooperative way of living and letting live, both individually and collectively, it is my belief that we should adhere to the philosophy announced by Washington and Jefferson. I am particularly impressed with this philosophy, due to our geographical location, and feel that for the time being we must work upon a basis of a national self-contained economy as far as it is practicable, and studiously avoid any foreign entanglements whatsoever.

Our President has made no request for the passage of this bill—it is not a part of his emergency program—therefore, I feel absolutely free to take the position I now take and feel compelled to do so in my representative capacity.

CROP-PRODUCTION LOANS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H.J.Res. 135) to amend section 2 of the act approved February 4, 1933, to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1933, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 135

Resolved, etc., That section 2 of the act of February 4, 1933 (Public, No. 327), be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end of the first sentence thereof the words: " and in the case of summer fallowing or winter wheat, a first lien, or an agreement to give a first lien on crops to be harvested in 1934, shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be deemed sufficient security."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, I understand this is to correct a law that was passed last February and to provide that the Government shall have a lien on crops planted this year and harvested next?

Mr. JONES. Yes; and without this provision, in the case of fallowing, they would have no security at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is it a unanimous report from the Agricultural Committee?

Mr. JONES. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if the committee has given consideration to amending the law so as to permit tenants to mortgage their interest in their several crops. I think it was a mistake, when the bill was originally passed, not to have incorporated such a provision in it.

Here is the situation as it affects my district in Oklahoma, and for that matter, the entire country: The Department of Agriculture is now requiring a waiver on the part of the landlord of his lien. Under the law in Oklahoma the tenant farmer can mortgage his interest in the crop. That provision ought to have been incorporated in the original bill. The Department of Agriculture construes it otherwise and insists on the waiver of the landlord's lien. I understand that in practically all cases the Department of Agriculture has required the landlord to waive his interest.

In many sections of the country much of the land is held in foreign ownership and is occupied and tilled by tenant farmers. It is estimated that in certain counties in my State 65 percent of the land is not occupied by the owners. That means, of course, that the Department of Agriculture declines and refuses to make crop loans to the tenant farmers on their interest in the crop unless and until the tenants get waivers from the landlords of their liens. Many of these landlords live outside of the State and some of them live long distances away. In effect this is a denial to tenant farmers of any opportunity to take advantage of the act of Congress providing for crop loans to farmers. The tenant farmers can go to the local banks or supply houses and, under the law in Oklahoma, mortgage their interests in their crops. That provision ought to have been incorporated in the original act when it was enacted.

I am not going to object now to the request from the Chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture [Mr. JONES] but do rise to protest against the rules and regulations adopted by the Department of Agriculture. The Department places the blame upon Congress but in my judgment the act was capable of interpretation which would have permitted tenant farmers to mortgage their interest in their crops without obtaining waivers of the landlords' liens.

I am not going to object now but serve notice that if this bill is brought up in the House at any future time, if I am a Member at the time I shall insist upon an amendment's being placed in the law making it clear that the landlord is not required to waive his lien. No tenant farmer can take advantage of this crop loan law who has an absentee landlord.

I am submitting herewith a letter from the crop production loan division of the Department of Agriculture, showing that the interpretation placed upon this law is as I have stated:

THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
CROP PRODUCTION AND FARMERS' SEED LOANS,
Washington, D.C., April 11, 1933.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HASTINGS: With reference to your telephone inquiry as to landlord waivers on crop-production loans, the only case in which we do not require a first lien on the entire crop, including a waiver from the landlord, is with reference to crops on which no part of the Government loan is used. If any of the money advanced by the Secretary of Agriculture is used for the production of a crop on the borrower's farm we then require a first lien, including waivers from holders of prior mortgages or waivers from the landlord if the borrower is a tenant. In certain sections where winter wheat is an important crop and we are now making loans for spring-planted crops, we are including winter wheat in our mortgage as additional security, although we are not in any way financing the production of winter wheat. On this winter wheat included as additional security we are not requiring a waiver from the landlord. In western Kansas, for instance, loans made this spring would be used for the planting of corn, sorghums, and other spring-planted crops which in themselves do not provide sufficient security for a loan. We require a first lien on these crops, including waivers from landlords or holders of prior mortgages, but in addition to a mortgage on these crops we ask the borrower to give us a lien on any winter wheat he may have. This usually is a second lien, the landlord's rights or those of other mortgagees being prior to ours so far as wheat is concerned. The situation with reference to this winter wheat is quite different from that with reference to cotton or any other spring planted crops which are being financed with the Government loan.

Very truly yours,

C. W. WARBURTON,
In Charge of Crop Production Loans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE LOUDERBACK

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged matter, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMENDMENT TO ARTICLE 5 OF THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES EXHIBITED AGAINST HAROLD LOUDERBACK, JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES IN AND FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

Article 5 is amended to read as follows:

"Article 5

"It is intended by article 5 to charge, and it is charged, that the reasonable and probable result of Harold Louderback's action in his capacity as judge in making decisions and orders in actions pending in his court and before him as said judge and by the method of appointing receivers and attorneys for receivers, by appointing incompetent receivers and attorneys, by his relationship and transactions with one Sam Leake, and by the relationship and transactions of the said Sam Leake with such appointees of the said respondent made possible and probable by the action and attitude of the said Harold Louderback, and by displaying a high degree of indifference to the interest of estates and parties in interest in receiverships before him and his court, and by displaying a high degree of interest in making it possible for certain individuals and firms to derive large fees from the funds of such estates, has been to create a general condition of wide-spread fear and distrust and disbelief in the fairness and disinterestedness of the official actions of the said Harold Louderback, and to create by his said acts, deeds, and relationships, contrary to his individual and official duty, a favorable condition and a cause for the development naturally and inevitably of rumors and suspicions destructive of public confidence in and respect for the said Harold Louderback as an individual and a judge to the scandal and disrepute of his said court and the administration of justice therein and prejudicial generally to the public respect for and public confidence in the Federal judiciary. Wherefore, the said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of misdemeanors in office.

"It is hereby alleged and charged that the conduct of said Harold Louderback, as alleged in articles 1, 2, 3, and 4, and as hereinafter alleged, in its general and aggregate result has been such as reasonably and probably calculated to destroy public confidence insofar as he and his court are concerned in that degree of disinterestedness and fidelity to judicial duty and responsibility which the public interest requires shall be held by the people in the Federal courts and in those who administer them, and which for a Federal judge to hurt or destroy is a crime and misdemeanor of the highest order;

"First, specifying as indicative of and disclosing the character and judicial attitude of said Harold Louderback revealed by his acts and official conduct to the people among whom he has jurisdiction, and the cause for the loss of public confidence of the bar and people of the northern district of California and particularly of the city of San Francisco, where the principal business of such court is transacted, on or about December 19, 1929, the said Harold Louderback appointed one Guy H. Gilbert receiver of the Sonora Phonograph Co., a going concern extensively engaged in the business of receiving and distributing radios and phonographs, the said Guy H. Gilbert being a personal and political friend of the said Harold Louderback, and an intimate friend and financial contributor to one Sam Leake, hereinafter referred to, the said Harold Louderback knowing at the time of such appointment that the whole training and experience of the said Guy H. Gilbert had been as operator and employee of a telegraph company, and the said Harold Louderback at the time of such appointment knowing with certainty that the said Guy H. Gilbert was without qualification to discharge the duties of such receivership, that the said Guy H. Gilbert was appointed such receiver by the said Harold Louderback without regard to the interest of such estate in receivership and in disregard thereof and of the interest of creditors and parties in interest and in violation of the official duty of the said Harold Louderback. That the said Gilbert after said appointment continued in his regular and usual duties and employment as employee of said telegraph company, drawing his accustomed salary during his employment of approximately 6 months as such receiver and received for such services from the funds of the estate of said Sonora Phonograph Co. the sum of $6,800, all of which facts became the subject of newspaper comments and matters of common knowledge throughout and beyond the northern judicial district of California, to the hurt of public confidence in the said Harold Louderback, judge of said court, and to the hurt and standing of the Federal judiciary. It also became a matter of newspaper comment in connection with that receivership matter and others, that theretofore, about 1925 or 1926, the said Gilbert had been appointed by the said Harold Louderback when the said Harold Louderback was a judge of the Superior Court of California, an appraiser of certain real estate, the said Harold Louderback well knowing at the time of such appointment that the said Gilbert was without any qualification to appraise the value of such real estate, and in truth the said Gilbert never saw said real estate and that the said Gilbert did not undertake to assist in the appraisal of said real estate, only signing the report which was presented to him, for which services he was allowed the sum of $500.

"The said Gilbert was also theretofore appointed receiver by Harold Louderback in the Stempel-Cooley case in 1929, bankruptcy, collecting during 3 or 4 months $12,000 rents for which he was allowed a fee of $500. In this matter, after conversation with the said Sam Leake, the said Gilbert appointed as his attorney one John Douglas Short who was an employee in the law office of Erskine & Erskine.

"The said Short was afterward, in March 1931, appointed attorney by one H. B. Hunter, receiver in what is known in this proceeding as the Russell Colvin Co. case, and which will hereinafter be specified with reference to. In the said Russell Colvin case the said H. B. Hunter, having been appointed such receiver by the said Harold Louderback, at the suggestion of the said Sam Leake, who theretofore had suggested to the said Gilbert the appointment of the said John Douglas Short in the Stempel-Cooley case, and the said H. B. Hunter, after his appointment as such receiver, appointed the said John Douglas Short as his attorney in said Russell Colvin case, the said Harold Louderback allowing the said John Douglas Short the sum of $50,000 on account as attorney for said receiver, H. B. Hunter.

"Preceding the appointment of the said H. B. Hunter in the said Russell Colvin case the said Harold Louderback had appointed one Addison G. Strong to be receiver therein, who, because he would not designate as his attorney the said John Douglas Short, as claimed by the said Addison G. Strong, or either the said John Douglas Short or certain other attorneys, as claimed by the said Harold Louderback, the said Addison G. Strong was summarily dismissed as receiver and the said Hunter appointed in his stead, who, on the same day of his said appointment as receiver by the said Harold Louderback, tendered to the said John Douglas Short the attorneyship in said receivership matter.

"On the 25th day of March 1931 one W. L. Hathaway, father-in-law of the said John Douglas Short, advanced as a loan to the said Sam Leake the sum of $1,000 in cash, and two days thereafterward the said John Douglas Short in an involved family transaction paid to the said W. L. Hathaway, from the compensation received as attorney in the Russell Colvin Co. matter, the sum of $5,000. Three months later the said Hathaway gave to the said Leake the further sum of $250.

"When the said Harold Louderback appointed the said H. B. Hunter, as aforesaid, receiver in the said Russell Colvin Co. case at the suggestion of the said Sam Leake, and the said Hunter in turn appointed the said John Douglas Short attorney for him in the Russell Colvin Co. case, he, the said Harold Louderback, resided at the Fairmont Hotel in a room registered and held in the name of the said Sam Leake, such arrangement being effected in conspiracy between the said Harold Louderback and Sam Leake to aid the said Harold Louderback in carrying out a certain plan and design, the said Harold Louderback pretending to reside in Contra Costa County, while actually and in fact residing in the city of San Francisco at the Fairmont Hotel in a room registered in the name of the said Sam Leake, the purpose and design of which arrangement having to do with the possible venue of a legal action which the said Harold Louderback contemplated might be brought against him. To further strengthen and add color to this pretended residence in Contra Costa County the said Harold Louderback registered as a voter in said Contra Costa County in violation of the laws of California, all of which transactions by the acts and conduct of the said Harold Louderback are involved in and mixed up with the official status and standing and transactions of the said Harold Louderback and are known to the people of the northern district of California and beyond such district to the disgrace and discredit of his office and to the hurt of public confidence therein and of the Federal judiciary. Thereby, as a result of such transactions, putting himself under obligation to, dependent upon, and under the influence of the said Sam Leake in a manner and to a degree utterly inconsistent with that required by the public interest of a Federal judge, and thereby putting himself, the said Harold Louderback, in an attitude with regard to obedience to law and the rights granted to litigants by the law and with regard to the standards of open candid conduct necessary to preserve for the public official that respect and confidence required by the public interest within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution requiring of Federal judges good behavior as a condition upon which their tenure of office depends. That said conduct is bad behavior and constitutes a forfeiture of the right of the said Harold Louderback to hold his the said office of judge of the northern district of California.

"In August 1931 the said Harold Louderback, without a hearing, upon a petition verified by an attorney 'upon information and belief' and without bond of indemnity, granted an equity receivership for the Prudential Holding Co., a concern engaged in extensive real-estate transactions, and appointed the said Guy H. Gilbert as receiver, who in turn designated Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as his attorneys. The first information the company had of the matter was when Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel appeared in the office of said Prudential Holding Co. to take charge of its affairs. The petition filed without truth or justification was resisted by said Prudential Holding Co., but the said Harold Louderback refused to dismiss the equity receivership matter until an application for receivership in bankruptcy was applied for, which application was based upon the grounds of the said equity receivership, wrongfully entertained. The bankruptcy matter fell in the division of Judge St. Sure, one of the judges of the said northern district of California. During the temporary absence of Judge St. Sure the said Harold Louderback, sitting in Judge St. Sure's division, named the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel receiver and attorneys, respectively, in the bankruptcy matter, and 2 days later dismissed the equity receivership. Upon the return of Judge St. Sure to his division, he, Judge St. Sure, promptly dismissed the bankruptcy proceeding because no insolvency was shown. No fees were allowed by Judge St. Sure.

"The proceedings in the matter and the facts, transactions, and statements therein became a matter of general knowledge within and beyond the said northern district of California, with its reasonable and probable and inevitable consequence to arouse dread and apprehension of the court and judicial power possessed by the said Harold Louderback on the part of the people generally, and particularly of those whose property might be seized upon through the instrumentality of such court, and generally to make said court disrespected and hateful. The said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel had theretofore and over the protest of the parties in interest on the ground that it was excessive been allowed a fee of $20,000 by the said Harold Louderback in the Sonora Phonograph Co. case, in which case they had also been associated with the said Gilbert, appointed by the said Harold Louderback as receiver therein.

"Some 6 months after the appointment of the said Gilbert & Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel as receiver and attorneys, respectively, in the said Prudential Holding Co. case, to wit, on the 17th day of February 1932, they were appointed by the said Harold Louderback receiver and attorneys, respectively, in the Fageol Motors Co. case. This company was known in the said northern district of California as one of the more important concerns in that part of the country. It had assets of $3,000,000 book value and liabilities amounting to $1,700,000, with automobile manufacturing, assembling, plants, branch offices, properties, and extensive operations in California, Washington, Oregon, and Utah. The said Harold Louderback knew and the people of that community knew at the time the said Guy H. Gilbert was appointed as receiver of said Fageol Motors Co. that the said Guy H. Gilbert was utterly without qualifications to discharge the duties of said receivership. That said appointment of said Gilbert and said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel was made in tyrannical and oppresive disregard of the rights and interest of the parties in interest, of the duty to conserve the assets of said company, and in disregard of his duty by the said Harold Louderback to the Government which had commissioned him to be one of its judges. That the facts and circumstances surrounding the appointment of the said Gilbert as receiver and the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel attorneys in said receivership matter and the method of procedure therein on the part of the said Harold Louderback inevitably as a necessary consequence were prejudicial to the judiciary and was to the scandal and disrepute of the court presided over by the said Harold Louderback and to the administration of justice therein, in that the said Fageol Motors Co. getting into financial difficulty the principal creditors of said company and the representatives of said Fageol Motors Co., after full conference and consideration, decided by agreement to apply to the Federal court for a receivership, and after careful consideration agreed upon Edward Fuller, of Oakland, a former official of the Chevrolet Motor Co., with extensive experience and demonstrated business and financial ability not only in the automobile business but in other matters of large proportions. Pursuant to said agreement, on the 17th day of February 1932, the papers were all prepared carrying out the plan agreed upon by Fageol Motors Co. and its creditors and the petition for receiver was filed in the Federal court of the northern district of California. By plan of assignment, determined by drawing numbers from a bag, this matter fell to the said Judge Louderback, there being three judges of said district. The parties in interest, representatives of the company and of the principal creditors, went to his chambers to see the said Judge Louderback with the papers in said matter, arriving shortly before the time for the noon recess of his court, but were advised by the clerk of the said judge that the noon recess would be delayed until 12:30, the said clerk asking what it was desired to see the judge about, and was told that it was the receivership matter of the Fageol Motors Co.; that the persons present represented the company and the larger creditors of said company; and that they had agreed upon Edward Fuller as a proper person for receiver, and to advise the judge of that fact, and that it was desired to discuss the matter with him at 1:30 p.m. At that time the parties in interest returned to see Judge Louderback and were told that Judge Louderback had got off for lunch earlier than anticipated, had some engagement, and would not return until 2:30. At 2:30 the parties in interest returned and were told by the clerk of the said Harold Louderback that Judge Louderback had already appointed the said Gilbert in said matter and that Judge Louderback was not there. In this matter the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel were also appointed attorneys for said receiver. The parties in interest, under threat of going into bankruptcy, which action would probably have ousted the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel entirely, effected an agreement with the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel by which other representatives chosen by the said parties in interest were to have effective control of the business and legal matters of the said motors company, the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel offering no obstruction to said representatives. The said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel accepted under the circumstances from the assets of said company the sum of $6,000 and the said Gilbert received approximately the same amount. The facts and circumstances connected with this matter show to the people of said district that the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel were not selected by the said Harold Louderback primarily because he deemed the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel best qualified to administer said estate, but resulted in large degree from the desire of the said Harold Louderback to procure for the said Gilbert and Dinkelspiel pecuniary benefits from the assets of this concern, which had been driven by financial difficulty to seek the protection of the court of the said Harold Louderback, all of which facts and circumstances received general publicity in the said northern district of California, to the scandal and disrepute of the court of said district, and when taken in connection with the explanation and excuse offered by the said Harold Louderback for the appointment of the said Gilbert as receiver in this matter and in other matters where the public knew the said Gilbert was utterly unqualified that he, the said Harold Louderback, in so appointing the said Gilbert, was acting under the control of a sense of judicial responsibility requiring him to appoint persons known to him of efficiency and integrity to manage the affairs of estates in receivership, which explanation and excuse also has been given wide publicity in said district, the reasonable and necessary and inevitable result of the claim of such high motive under the circumstances was to create the impression and public belief that the said Harold Louderback was attempting by such claim to hide his lack of such actuating motive and to hide his real motive for making such appointments by an insincere and hypocritical claim of having been actuated by them, to the disgust and humiliation of the people of the northern district of California and to the hurt of the public interest.

"In September 1930, in the court of the said Harold Louderback, an equity receivership petition was filed in the Golden State Asparagus case seeking an economical conduct of the business while its obligations were being adjusted. When the receiver was appointed the said Harold Louderback agreed to submit to said receiver a list of attorneys from which he could name his counsel, but the list was not furnished. Instead the said Harold Louderback designated as attorney for said receiver the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel without reference to the receiver. The legal work connected with the conduct of the receivership was not appreciably more difficult or voluminous than that incident to the ordinary running of the business, which had theretofore cost the business less than $1,000 per year. The said Harold Louderback allowed the said Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel $14,000 on account, while he denied the uncontested application for $1,500 each, reasonable fees, made by the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant who had performed the only substantial legal services rendered in the case when they prevented a forced sale of the property. These attorneys, in an effort to protect the assets of the said Asparagus Co. had opposed the payment of the fees allowed to Dinkelspiel & Dinkelspiel on the ground that they were excessive. These acts of said Harold Louderback were well known to the public in and beyond said northern district of California and cumulatively added to the disrespect, apprehension, and public contempt.

"In the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association equity receivership, a Texas insurance corporation doing business in California, the company getting into financial difficulty, the insurance commissioner for the State of California seized the assets of said company in the State of California for the benefit of California policyholders. It was determined as a matter of procedure to ask for an equity receivership with the plan that said insurance commissioner be appointed so as to permit him to continue to hold said assets and administer them without extra cost for a receiver and resultant diminution of the company's California assets. Instead, however, the said Harold Louderback designated one Samuel Shortridge, Jr., as receiver. Thereupon the official of the State of California took proper steps to terminate proceedings in the Federal court. The said Harold Louderback enjoined the insurance commissioner from proceeding under the laws of the State of California. Appeal was taken to the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals and reversal had on the ground of lack of Federal jurisdiction, and the property ordered to be turned over to the officials of California. To this order and mandate of the circuit court of appeals the said Harold Louderback, without any authority of law, imposed a condition that said order and mandate should be complied with provided there be no appeal taken from the order made by him, the said Louderback, allowing a fee of $6,000 to the said Shortridge and his attorney. All of which facts and circumstances became published and known in said northern district of California.

By such acts the said Harold Louderback exhibited himself to the public as being willing to obstruct the officials of the State of California in their effort to conserve for citizens of California the assets of said insurance company which they had impounded, willing to assert a jurisdiction which he did not possess, willing to defy a mandate of the circuit court of appeals and attach an illegal and unconscionable condition to said mandate in order to penalize and discourage the exercise of a constitutional right of appeal for the definite and obvious purpose of making sure, so far as possible by such illegal action and coercion, that the said Shortridge and his attorney would be paid from the assets of said insurance company so impounded the fees which he, the said Harold Louderback, had allowed, all to the scandal and discredit of the said Harold Louderback and his court and prejudicial to the dignity of the judiciary.

"Wherefore the said Harold Louderback has been and is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and has not conducted himself with good behavior."

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This is simply a bill of particulars that is to be presented to the Senate, that meets with the approval of all of the managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, with regard to the matter which the Clerk has just read, it is in effect a bill of particulars. This is an amendment to section 5 of the impeachment charges, and the matter has been agreed to by all the managers on the part of the House. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 108, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 108

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted an amendment to article 5 of the articles of impeachment heretofore exhibited against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

And also that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House, any subsequent pleadings they shall deem necessary.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A STATESMAN WHO IS MISSED

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article written by our colleague the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article is as follows:

ARTICLE BY HON. U. S. GUYER, OF KANSAS, PAYING TRIBUTE TO THE LATE WILLIAM R. WOOD, OF INDIANA

For 20 years the late William R. Wood, of Indiana, former Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, fed the pigeons at the corner of the House Office Building adjacent to the Library of Congress. After having his breakfast, and promptly at a certain time each morning, Mr. Wood would come to this corner with an abundant supply of cornbread or other suitable food which he tossed on the pavement and the plot of grass bordering the walk.

When in Washington he never failed his pigeons, and most of the time he was detained in the Capital both by the Committee on Appropriations and also by the Republican Congressional Committee, of which he was chairman for many years. Thus many generations of burnished, blue, and purple pigeons learned to know him, and as he talked to them he insisted that they "sassed" him back in pigeon language.

Then, on last November 8, he finally met defeat for Congress and became one of that distinguished group of seasoned statesmen, of whom there were more than a hundred, who retired from public life at the close of the last session of Congress—the last "lame duck" session of Congress which will ever convene. Their names form an imposing roster of the great men of the Nation. During this last short session Mr. Wood worked, as usual, like a galley slave from 5 o'clock in the morning till late at night. Then one day Congress adjourned sine die, and another morning the retiring statesman sadly but affectionately fed the pigeons he loved, whispered good-bye to them, and took a train to New York, where he was to sail on an Atlantic liner for a good rest and a cruise on the Mediterranean.

But before he could sail he was mortally stricken, and ever since the purple pigeons wait in a pathetic vigil, looking up with expectant gaze at every passer-by, hoping again to hear the voice of their old friend. But he has sailed on a ship that never comes back. So, after 20 years of devoted service to his country, during which he saved millions for the people, and after raveling out his life like a prodigal spendthrift in their service, he is missed—by the pigeons. Sic transit gloria mundi, which, being translated, means that there is a vast difference between pigeons and people.

THE SITUATION IN CUBA

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for 20 minutes on the obligation of the Congress under the Platt amendment in regard to the Cuban situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to object to the request of the gentleman from New York, but I am compelled to do so at this time.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER, KANSAS CITY, KANS.

The SPEAKER. This is consent day, and the Clerk will call the Consent Calendar.

The first business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H.R. 48) to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, Kans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I notice there are six bridge bills on the calendar today and all of them grant consent to a municipality or some subdivision of a State to construct a bridge, with the exception of this one. In the first place, let me ask who composes the Interstate Bridge Co.?

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, that is composed of an organization in both the States of Kansas and Missouri. The Governor of Missouri is one of the directors, and distinguished men in both States are on that commission.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I notice that the gentleman's letter to the committee says that legislation has been enacted by the State of Missouri and legislation is pending in the State of Kansas for the purpose of providing approaches to this bridge. This is a toll bridge. It is a private toll bridge. This very question has come up on the floor of the House time and time again, and this House has voted down every effort to spend the people's money to construct approaches to private toll bridges. What does that mean? It takes the money of the people to construct concrete roads up to a bridge and then charges the people whose money has been spent to construct the approaches, for the right to go over the bridge.

Mr. GUYER. These approaches are merely connections with great highways.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes; but how far is the highway likely to be from the entrance to the bridge?

Mr. GUYER. Not far.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Oh, it is likely to be 5 or 10 miles.

Mr. GUYER. It is not a mile.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. How close is the highway to this bridge?

Mr. GUYER. In Kansas City, Kans., it is not more than a few hundred feet, and in Missouri it is less than a mile.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If that is the case why could not the bridge corporation build its own approaches?

Mr. GUYER. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation did not want to loan the money to anybody except just to the bridge itself.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And for that reason the States of Missouri and Kansas must build the approaches to the bridge? The promoters should do it; and if they are not willing, the bridge should not be built.

Mr. GUYER. Well, the States and municipalities and everybody are doing it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This report also shows that the Department of Agriculture, in making a favorable report on this bill, is under the impression that the work has started.

Mr. GUYER. Well, it has.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. To what extent?

Mr. GUYER. Some piers have been put in.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Does the gentleman feel there is any chance the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would advance this money?

Mr. GUYER. Oh, yes. They are ready to put it up just the moment this bill is passed. It will mean work for months for many people.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That means work for the unemployed, and in view of that situation and the gentleman's assurance that distinguished citizens compose the corporation, I will not object, but I am going to look over these private toll bridge bills during this session, as I have in the past, and they will not get by unless it can be shown there is reasonable ground that they will be built and that there is a necessity for the bridge, and it is not solely for convenience.

Mr. GUYER. This one will be.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Kansas City, Kans., authorized to be built by the Interstate Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, by an act of Congress approved May 22, 1928, heretofore extended by acts of Congress approved March 2, 1929, and June 30, 1930, is hereby further extended 2 years from May 22, 1933.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEE DEE RIVER AND WACCAMAW RIVER, GEORGETOWN, S.C.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H.R. 1596) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Pee Dee River and a bridge across the Waccamaw River, both at or near Georgetown, S.C.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Pee Dee River and a bridge across the Waccamaw River, both at or near Georgetown, S.C., authorized to be built by the county of Georgetown, S.C., by an act of Congress approved May 29, 1930, are hereby extended 2 and 4 years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the words "two and four" and insert the words "one and three"; page 2, line 1, after the word "from", strike out the words "the date of approval hereof" and insert the following: "May 29, 1933."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS WACCAMAW RIVER NEAR CONWAY, S.C.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H.R. 4127) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Waccamaw River near Conway, S.C.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by act of Congress approved February 10, 1932, to be built by the State Highway Commission of South Carolina across the Waccamaw River near Conway, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read: "A bill to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Waccamaw River near Conway, S.C."

BRIDGE ACROSS ALLEGHENY RIVER NEAR PARKERS LANDING, PA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H.R. 4225) granting the consent of Congress to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Allegheny River at or near Parkers Landing, in the county of Armstrong, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. SNYDER. I will reserve the objection in order that I may have a little time to look into this matter.

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania. It is all set forth in the report. Permit me to say this is an emergency matter. The State of Pennsylvania builds the highway bridges.

Mr. SNYDER. I understand.

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania. This bridge is simply to replace an old bridge which has been there for a hundred years. It has been rebuilt a couple of times. The old bridge is about ready to fall down. There is no reason why any objection should be made. They simply overlooked for a little while the necessity for obtaining this enabling act, and their contracts are awarded, and everything is held up until this bill is passed.

Mr. SNYDER. When was this bridge destroyed?

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania. Oh, it is still standing, but they have to creep across it. Anything heavy cannot cross it. It is absolutely necessary to construct this bridge, and it would be a serious matter to delay it under the circumstances. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. SNYDER. Is this right at Parkers Landing?

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania. Yes; it is right where the old bridge is placed. They will tear the old bridge down.

Mr. SNYDER. What is the proposed cost of this?

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania. Oh, I do not know. It will be one of the kind of bridges which the State of Pennsylvania builds. It will be a good bridge, a very heavy structural-steel bridge.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the majority leader what is the program for the balance of the afternoon?

Mr. BYRNS. We will complete this Consent Calendar, and there is nothing else.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Allegheny River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Parkers Landing, in the county of Armstrong, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

a point near the Forest-Venango county line, in Tionesta Township, and in the county of Forest, and in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Allegheny River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, near the Forest-Venango county line, in Tionesta Township, Forest County, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MAHONING RIVER, AT STRUTHERS, OHIO

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4491, granting the consent of Congress to the Board of County Commissioners of Mahoning County, Ohio, to construct a free overhead viaduct across the Mahoning River at Struthers, Mahoning County, Ohio.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress be, and it is hereby, granted to the Board of County Commissioners of Mahoning County, Ohio, and its successors in office, to construct, maintain, and operate a free overhead viaduct, together with the necessary approaches thereto, across the Mahoning River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at Struthers, Mahoning County, Ohio, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of an overhead viaduct across the Mahoning River at Struthers, Mahoning County, Ohio."

KEEP THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY LIBERAL

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD concerning the discharge rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is proposed by our Committee on Rules to recommend to this House a change in the discharge rule which, as it now stands, permits 145 Members, upon the signing of a petition, to discharge a committee from further consideration of particular legislation and bring the measure to the floor for debate and decision by the entire Membership of the House. Our Rules Committee, now that the Democratic Party is in the majority, comes forth with the proposition that this discharge rule be changed, raising the number of Representatives necessary on a discharge petition from 145 to 218. If ever a proposition were advanced by any committee and the Committee on Rules in particular, to test the individual sincerity of the Membership of this House in their endeavors ably to represent their constituency, this proposal to apply even more stringent gag rule to the Membership than has been applied heretofore during the session, is the most direct. If I were writing a page of history which discussed this particular proposition, I might use for a title, "Stepping Backward with the Democratic Party."

This is no time to bring in any rules of this kind to a House of Representatives or to a party elected because the mass of the American people believed we would be a liberal party insistent upon liberal legislation. I am told that this is designed to prevent the Republican minority in the House from embarrassing the President by bringing controversial measures to the floor of the House. To my mind that is the same kind of half-truth we have been handed for a good many weeks in the past on everything connected with this question of gag rule.

Let us review the few arguments in favor of this proposed change as propounded by its sponsors. First of all, argument no. 1, is that unless this rule is changed 27 Democrats may align themselves with the Republican minority to embarrass the President. Do these gentlemen who advance that argument wish to convey to me or to any of the rest of the Democratic Membership that our President, up in the White House, has looked over the Democratic Membership and said to our leaders, "Gentlemen, there are 27 potential traitors among you. You have to fix up the rules to prevent them committing treason." Such an argument is an insult and a damnable libel on every Democratic Member of this House. I am just as much entitled to say that among our committees, controlled by the Democrats, there are committees that may be traitors as anyone is entitled to say that among the whole delegation there are 27 unknown Democrats awaiting the opportunity to turn traitor to our President.

Argument no. 2, advanced in favor of this proposed reactionary change in the rules, is that it is just an emergency proposition and does not give the real meaning of the Democratic Membership on the question of liberal or restrictive rules in the House. That is some more bunk! A lot of crimes have been committed in the name of emergency and in the name of the President in the past few weeks; and as only one example to prove this contention of mine, I point to the press-censorship law which was passed by this House a few days ago.

This measure, gentlemen, is not aimed at the Republican Party; it is aimed at the Democrats. It is not designed to choke off Republican legislation because it is a laughable proposition to go before the press and the American people and say we are more afraid of fewer Republicans today than we were of the larger group of them less than a year ago, when we supported and approved the present liberal rule. This measure is designed to throttle the expressions of Democrats in this House who were elected as liberals, who are expected to be liberals, and are going to do their best to carry out the liberal policies for which both they and the President campaigned.

The whole proposition has a strong odor of hypocrisy when I find that it is supported by men who in the last session of Congress openly favored liberalization of the rules so they could bring the subject of beer and whisky to the floor of the House, but now want the rules changed to keep other measures off the floor of the House, that are just as important to the American people as beer and whisky is or ever will be. This very measure camouflaged under the guise of stifling a Republican minority, is in reality intended to stifle a Democratic majority who have come down here to enact liberal legislation and not make a racket out of holding a seat in Congress by doing only enough to give them an excuse and an issue for a reelection campaign. There are some of us here who are anxious to see this House of Representatives carry out the pledges made to the American people as quickly as possible regardless of the set opinions of any chairman of any committee in the House. And lest we forget, permit me to point out that the change in the Membership of this House, by the election of 169 new Members, was not alone a question of party. The people of the United States were sick and tired of the antics of Congress, and the election in a good many districts was an election decided upon a basis of the "ins" against the "outs". That is proved by the fact that a good many Democrats who once sat here were defeated in primaries by new Democrats. That had nothing to do with the Roosevelt landslide or any other kind of a landslide.

Now, for the benefit of those who sponsor this backward step of the Democratic Party which will create a schism in our ranks that there is no need for at this time and which will make us look like machine politicians suddenly in view of the feed trough, I want to review a few choice remarks by my esteemed friend from Illinois, who spoke in another session of this Congress in favor of liberalizing the rules. He is such an artist with words and I so admire his ability to handle words in defense of liberality, that I cannot refrain from reading to you some of the gems from the remarks of the distinguished Mr. SABATH when he spoke for the adoption of this present liberal rule which we now have been asked to change. I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. These remarks are on page 81, volume 75, first session of the Seventy-second Congress. Mr. SABATH says:

When I entered the House Uncle Joe Cannon was its Speaker. * * * At that time the Speaker was the House, but in 1910, during the Sixty-first session of Congress, with the aid of the press and a few true Progressives from Wisconsin, after a most determined fight, which was tantamount to a revolution of procedure under the leadership of our then leader, Champ Clark, our present Speaker, John N. Garner, the present majority leader, Henry T. Rainey, Claude Kitchin, and Judge Shackleford, of Missouri, we succeeded in amending the rules and freeing the Membership from the tyrannical rule and dictatorship of the Speaker. * * * Today, after 22 years, thanks to the Democratic majority, we again have a chance and an opportunity to liberalize the rules and to relieve the Membership from the extremely restrictive and established rulings which have been in effect the last 10 years of Republican rule. * * * To me, who continually demanded the liberalization of these rules, it is a great satisfaction that we are about to protect the Members in their rights and privliges so long denied them, for not only was the House often at the mercy of the Speaker, but also at the mercy of the conferees and of the various chairmen of the committees.

Now, just as Mr. SABATH opposed the dictatorship of the Speaker and fought so long to break down this dictatorship, I stand here and oppose giving a dictatorship to committees of the House.

Let me interject here that the contention that unless we change this rule we place the fact and the future of our President and his measures in danger through the action and opposition of a small Republican minority is stretching the facts. For, if this contention is true, we likewise place the President, by a change to a stricter rule, in the dangerous position of being entirely at the mercy of these committees as they are now constituted in the House. With the rule raised to a total of 218 or more members, as is now proposed, every committee in this House is in a position to say to the President, "Unless we approve the provisions of the measures you advocate, or unless you make us these concessions, you, Mr. President, have not a chance of getting your measures to the floor of the House from the Democratic side or any other side." In arguments in favor of this proposed change the remark has been made that it is a matter of practical politics. I have studied this proposal to incorporate the gag rule more definitely in the House rules than heretofore, from a political standpoint, and I should like to point out a few of the political aspects for the benefit of those Members who are not completely familiar with the set-up of this Seventy-third Congress. First of all, I have noticed that a delegation from one financially and industrially powerful Eastern State seems to be unanimous in supporting this proposed change which would prevent a committee from being discharged when it refused to act upon a measure of interest to the great majority of the Membership of this House. It is interesting to note that this particular Eastern State is represented with a chairmanship on seven important committees in the present Congress. Most of the Members of the House know that the chairman of a committee is usually the deciding authority on whether or not any legislation shall be reported out of the committee for hearing and decision by the Membership of the House as a whole.

Practical politics would lead me to wonder if a minority block of votes in the Democratic Party in the present Congress was not seeking a means by which a few eastern financial and industrial centers would be in a better position to make their power felt in decisions affecting not only the people of the United States but the peoples of the great Middle, North, and Southwest sections when this eastern block of votes in the House were in a postion to throw their weight from one side to another under the stricter rules. It is practical politics to suspect that a block of 30 or 40 votes in the Democratic House, well organized and controlled, would be far more effective under the 218 rule than they would be under the present 145 rule. That is the practical-politics side of this proposed change, and it perhaps would not have occurred to me had not some of the eastern delegations in the Democratic Party in this House taken such an active and positive stand in favoring the application of a stricter rule against the entire Membership of the present Congress. It is practical politics from the side of an organized minority in the Democratic Party to wish their position strengthened in their ability to affect Democratic policies through a change of this rule, but it is most impractical for any Democratic Member not aligned with a definite, organized minority within the Democratic ranks to support such a change which will in the future, I am sure, react most unfavorably toward the liberal legislation which the majority of Democrats have come here to endeavor to enact.

Now we come to the argument that is being advanced to a good many new Members that perhaps the President wants this rule changed. Perhaps he wants the Democrats to become reactionaries now that they are in power? Perhaps he wants the Democrats to play machine politics, to bring machine or "boss" politics on the floor of the House and choke off liberal thought not only in our party but in the House as a whole? I do not believe that is true, and the reason for my disbelief is my knowledge of Mr. Roosevelt's political career, which is a guaranty that he would never sponsor such a "boss" measure.

There are a lot of new Members here, of which I am one, and I should like to call their attention to some incidents in the career of Franklin Roosevelt which set him on the road to the White House, where he is today, and then they may judge for themselves, if Frankling Roosevelt were a Member of this House, on which side of this question he would vote. I quote from the articles written by our President's mother, Mrs. James Roosevelt, and appearing at the present time in the Hearst newspapers. How would our President vote on this issue of departing from a liberal rule, when his own mother says of him in his early career, and I quote:

Franklin was one of the opposing senators who refused to stop thinking and do as he was told. On the contrary, he set quietly to work organizing an up-State opposition movement. Franklin, who had been elected on an anti-bossism platform, was determined to carry out his pledge to his constituents, even though it meant an open break with the bosses of his own party. And further, he had run on a self-imposed platform which promised that he would try to represent the voters insofar as they made their desire known to him through their votes.

Now let us go on farther in the Roosevelt career as our President's mother portrays it in her articles in the daily papers. From the Wilson campaign I quote the following:

It was not long before he (Franklin Roosevelt) was bucking a powerful lobby that was threatening his program to regulate commission merchants.

And then we see him as Governor of New York, and his mother says of his career:

It was no time at all before there was antagonism to Franklin's water-power bill and the then Governor of New York had to go to law to prove the justice of his contention.

Now let me point out that the very President in whose name some are endeavoring to convince us that we should change this liberal rule under the pretense of blocking a Republican minority refused to let even a lower court reversal stand in his way to fight for what was right. When the Democratic Party departs from this liberal rule, fostered and promoted by it for years, it is departing not only from the liberals of the United States and divorcing itself from a principle for which the Democratic Party has always stood, but it is straying from the path of our own President's personal political philosophy. The people are not going to be fooled by the hokum that a vast majority of Democrats are afraid of the political tricks of a ridiculously small minority of Republicans. When a Member votes for a departure from this liberal rule he votes to pass the buck to a committee in order that he can go back to his constituents and say, "I could not carry out my pledges to you because the committees were against me." The citizens of every district represented here in the House expect their Congressmen to fight just as hard as they can to promote the interests of their districts and the carrying out of pledges made in the campaign. And the last election should be a warning that the people will not tolerate a "buck passer", regardless of whether he is a Democrat or a Republican. A great many of the new Members, including myself, have strived since the first day of our seating in this House to find and attach ourselves to some principle of conduct that will guide us in our duties toward our constituency and toward the House. There is no better place than here and now to recall the able and brilliant remarks of Edmund Burke made to his constituents in 1774:

> It should be the glory as well as the honor of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes should at all times have great weight with him, their opinions high respect, their business his unremitted attention But his mature opinion, his unbiased judgment, his enlightened conscience he should not surrender to any men or set of men. These he does not derive from the law or the constitution. They are the gift of Providence, for the use of which he is deeply responsible

And then Mr. Burke, in concluding, says something that should be burned in the mind of everyone who casts a vote on this measure, and that is:

> Your representative owes you not only his industry but he owes you his judgment as well, and he is betraying instead of serving you when he sacrifices that judgment to the opinion of others.

Now, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the motto of the great State from which I come is expressed in one word. It is "forward". I want to go forward with the Democratic Party in this Congress. I want to go forward without sacrificing my right to support and fight for the interests of my constituents by every possible and legitimate means. In this unfortunate attempt to saddle upon the Democratic majority and the President of the United States a dictatorship of committees in this House through a change in the rules, I must vote against the proposed change. In the caucus which discussed this matter it was said that all we had to do was change the rules of the caucus to pledge that no Democrat would sign a Republican petition. If this measure were not aimed at the Democrats instead of the Republicans this alternative proposition which I have just mentioned would solve any threat of danger from the Republican minority, and we could settle our party problems within our party ranks, where they belong, and not out on the floor of the House, where we are about to make ourselves ridiculous and place the Democratic Representatives in a position of consenting to be gagged by the very rules of the House which, in my opinion, are not even now as liberal as they should and could be. I want to go forward with the President and the Democratic Party. I cannot go backward by supporting this change and shall vote against this rule brought in by the Committee on Rules.

EMBARGO ON ARMS AND MUNITIONS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the embargo bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is, Shall the President of the United States receive from the Congress the right and authority to place an embargo on munitions of war against an aggressor nation?

The claim cannot be made or urged here, by those who favor this legislation, that this measure comes to this body clothed in that familiar garment called "emergency." No one here has heard that an emergency exists for the passage of this kind of legislation. To confer upon the Chief Magistrate such tremendous, discretionary power is to constitute him judge and jury of a situation which could lead this Nation into war. The President of the United States, either acting alone or in concert with other powers, could declare who the aggressor is. Such a power would supersede all the laws of neutrality.

Under this bill the President could declare in a conflict of arms between belligerent nations who was in the right and who was in the wrong. He could render a verdict of guilty or not guilty in a case over which we might have no jurisdiction. Such a declaration, no matter how righteous it might appear, would at once be an unfriendly act, to say the least, against the nation declared to be the aggressor, and it would be an act of sufficient cause to lead to ultimate hostility between this country and the offended nation. It would be a severe departure from the established policy of this Government since it took its place among the civilized powers of the world. It would be an unneutral act. It would be meddling in business that is none of our business. We would declare, by passing this legislation, that the Father of our Country was wrong when he advised the young Republic to keep free from foreign entanglements. We would herald to the world a new policy of action in which we would say that after 140 years the principle laid down by the fathers of the Republic is all wrong. It is the Congress of the United States and not the President that is charged with the solemn right of laying embargoes and declaring war under the Constitution.

Any legislation that would make it easier to embroil this country in conflict ought to be defeated, and any law that would make it harder to engage in conflict should be passed.

Let the United States keep the even tenor of its way.

This legislation instead of preventing war would have a tendency of leading us into war.

THE HARRIMAN NATIONAL BANK OF NEW YORK

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, some days ago I submitted a resolution providing for investigation by the Judiciary Committee of the reported failure of the Department of Justice under the last preceding administration to investigate certain alleged law violations attributed to some officers and directors of the Harriman National Bank, of New York City. The resolution has been favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary and by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may now be considered by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 55) submitted by Mr. COSTIGAN on the calendar day of March 31, 1933.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 2, line 9, after the word "exceed", to insert "$500", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the reported failure on the part of the Department of Justice to prosecute promptly alleged violations of law by the Harriman National Bank, New York City, or the officers or directors thereof. The committee shall report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, the result of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire if under the rule the resolution should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and to the Committee to Audit and Control and has been reported favorably by both committees. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR COPELAND ON SAFETY OF LIFE AT SEA

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, on Saturday, April 15, the twenty-first anniversary of the sinking of the Titanic, the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] made a radio speech on the safety-of-life-at-sea convention which has been pending before the Senate now for some 4 years' time. I ask unanimous consent that that address may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Twenty-one years ago today the American people were shocked at the tragic sinking of the great liner, the Titanic, with a loss of 1,517 souls. Every person throughout our broad land trembled with horror. Their hearts went out to the families of those who died. At the same time there were thrills of pride as stories of unselfish heroism came trickling in over the wires. With bated breath and racing pulse we read how the brave male passengers and crew put women and children into the life boats and stood calmly by, awaiting their own fate.

That tragedy demonstrated sharply and for the first time the value of radio in making lives safe at sea. In those days we called the new contraption the "wireless." We did not dream that the human voice would ever be projected through the air as mine is now being sent out to my listeners.

The radio did not save the Titanic, but it saved her pitifully few survivors. For weeks the air rang with public demands for every sort of appliance, device, contrivance, and method to make ocean travel safer. Many reforms were achieved, and for them we are duly thankful, but today, more than 2 decades later, the world still lags behind in its responsibility to provide the maximum of prevention of disaster.

We of the United States have always led the world in the adoption of reforms for the benefit of humanity. We led the world in efforts to increase safety of life at sea 20 years ago. We did this despite the fact that our material stake at that time was negligible. We then had but 17 American-flag ships in foreign trade. Today, as a result of wise national shipping policies made operative since the World War, we have 600 American vessels in foreign trade. We employ thousands instead of hundreds on our ships at sea. We transport one third, instead of one ninth, of our own commerce. This changed condition in addition to our unselfish, altruistic impulse to help preserve human life, has given us a selfish, material interest in our great merchant fleet, the second largest in the world. Nothing must happen to stay our maritime program.

We have had repeated evidence of the efficiency and bravery of the officers and men of that merchant fleet. Time and time again the country has run with tales of heroism as American officers and crews from our own gallant flag ships have gone to the succor of brothers in distress. We have the ships. We have the men. Through them we are bringing about a renaissance of American shipping. Our position has become comparable to the glorious days of the American clipper. Certainly, there rests upon us a solemn obligation to these brave men as well as to passengers on their ships. We are solemnly obligated to do all in our power to protect their lives.

On this day, particularly, the anniversary of one of the most appalling tragedies in the history of the sea, we might well turn our attention to the treaty for safety now pending in the United States Senate. This covenant was drafted and agreed to in 1929 by representatives of 18 nations, including our own. It has been ratified by 11 nations and adhered to by 6 others. Only 7 nations, including our own, have failed to accept it. This is a sad commentary on the slowness of our legislation. There is no question that, under the operation of what is proposed by the pending treaty, many lives now lost at sea would be saved. I do not hesitate to state that had the treaty been in effect and in force in 1928 the terrible accident to the Vestris would have been prevented. That, my friends of the radio audience, is something to think about. The tragedy of the Vestris was one of the worst in peace time since the Titanic. Here, again, heroic American officers and crews from American-flag ships played a noble part. We have such a large merchant marine now that ships carrying the Stars and Stripes are almost certain to be found near the scene of any disaster on any of the world trade routes. We are proud of this. But how much better it is to prevent disasters. Shipping experts show that the Vestris disaster comes under the head of preventable accidents, and it offers just one more convincing argument for early ratification of the treaty.

The provisions of the treaty constitute a great advance in compulsory safety measures over the United States laws and over the laws of most nations. Its provisions are superior to the previous requirements of any nation. It embodies all that the experience available in 1914–15 could give and, in addition, the great amount of experience and knowledge derived from the all-too-practical tests during the World War.

The treaty takes advantage of the progress in science, invention, and practical experience gathered since the war. The convention of 1914, following the loss of the Titanic, made great strides forward in the protection of life at sea. It is but natural, however, that, after 20 years, any regulations affecting construction, equipment, radio installations, and matters connected with the operation of ships, including the giving of succor at sea, should need revision and improvement.

If we were to compare the figures for loss of life at sea with those for loss of life in other fields—motor traffic, for example—we might be led to believe that no urgent need for the pending treaty exists. Statistics as to sea casualties are not appalling. For the past 10 years they have averaged only 50 per annum, but these figures should be considered from two points of view other than that of their magnitude. One is that about every so often some horrible disaster like the sinking of the Titanic occurs. That makes average figures pale into insignificance. In that disaster 1,517 lives were lost and only 706 were saved.

The other point of view from which to consider statistics on ocean disasters is their preventability. The best opinion of experts today is that 20 percent of the lives lost during the past 10 years could have been saved had this treaty been in operation. That number of lives is worth saving. Still another viewpoint is that of the peace of mind of passengers on ships and the peace of mind of dear ones whom they leave at home. With this treaty in operation loss of life at sea would be reduced to the minimum. A passenger embarking for an ocean trip would do so with a feeling of practically complete security, and, of course, this would stimulate travel. Business would be better for the steamers and more and more of our citizens would broaden their horizons by seeing more and more of the world.

In thinking back to the Titanic and the awful fate which befell that great superliner—the biggest and finest of her day—you might, naturally, say to yourself, "Why, the Titanic struck an iceberg. That accident was unavoidable. Any ship might hit a submerged or partly submerged iceberg, any day, with similar results."

All very well, but icebergs are one of the things covered in this very treaty. Ever since the Titanic disaster efforts have been made to locate icebergs and warn vessels of their presence. Under the treaty now pending systematic patrol, recording, and warning as to icebergs will be carried out by coordinated, international activities. Furthermore, since 21 years ago today devices have been invented and applied by which the near presence of icebergs can be detected and automatically recorded through temperature changes in the water. When this treaty is ratified by all parties signatory to it the iceberg menace will be a thing of the past.
